Urban Journalism Workshop helps high schoolers make career choices, gain publishing experience

The Urban Journalism Workshop is designed to encourage minority students to make journalism their career.

Similar workshops are sponsored nationally by The Dow Jones Newspaper Fund and locally by daily newspapers.

This year's Urban Journalism Workshop was held on the Western Campus and ran from June 12 to June 23. The program is in its twenty-fifth year.

The workshops help some students decide whether they plan to enter journalism careers. Those who are interested in the workshop and decide to major in journalism are almost assured a job soon after graduation. Along with UJW is Project Focus, which distributes names of all previous participants to newspapers interested in hiring apprentices.

The average day at the workshop begins early and ends late. There are daily speakers, assignments, field trips, and the production of a laboratory newspaper UJW not only teaches better reporting techniques, but also covers photography, advertising, editing and graphics. It also gives students the opportunity to travel and meet new people.
