All of the sources that I used to research my topic were beneficial in different ways, but some of them were a lot easier to use than others. The journal article that I accessed through the online data bases were harder to find than the Occupational Outlook Handbook or the free resource that I used online. It took a lot longer to use the online data base than it did the other two sources. Out of all of the sources that I used to research Information Technology, the Occupational Outlook Handbook was by far the easiest to use. All of the information that I needed was in one spot, and it was very easy to find the topic that I wanted to research.

All of the sources that I used provided salary ranges for a career in Computer Information Technology. All of these sources also included education requirements, of at least a Bachelor’s Degree. Some of these sources also included information about the work environment, number of jobs available, and also similar occupations. Overall, most of the resources that I found included this information, with the exception of the journal that I found using the online database.

After researching my topic, my perceptions on computer information technology have not changed. Before I chose Computer Information Technology as my major, I did research on this career by myself. I’ve been working with computers my whole life, and I knew that the salary for this field was very appealing. The journal that I accessed online also stated that jobs in this field are growing very rapidly. I also already knew this, because I wanted to make sure that I would be able to get a job after college. All of these sources helped me realize that I chose the right career for my future. People in this field make a lot of money, and the job security in this field is also a good characteristic. In conclusion, researching this career did not change my perception of the career, but it made me realize that I made the right decision about my future job.
