Civilians for Hearing G.I. Complaints Urged

You've got to teach the enlisted man what his rights are and how he can go about getting them.

"A regular part of the recruit's orientation should be lectures and training films on his rights and how to go about getting them. He should be assured no reprisals would follow a complaint, even an unfounded one. I had been in the Army a year before I learned that I could take a complaint higher than my company commander."

Had Opposite Effect.

On discipline, he said:
"I have been told that the reason for floods of admittedly senseless orders was to condition us to obey all orders without stopping to think whether they made sense or not. The effect on me was just the opposite. I never did get over the habit of asking myself: 'Is this order really necessary or is it something I ought to evade?'"

Kendall insisted there should be no disparity in food for officers and men.

"Some of this disparity could be reduced," he said, "by getting the best out of what's available for the enlisted men. Let some of the good cooks stay in the enlisted messes, instead of stealing them for officers."

'Still Cast to Servile Mind.'

"In the Eighth Army we had 16 cooks for 1,500 enlisted men. That's about half as many cooks as the table of organization provides. We had one baker until he got so good the officers took him. The 500 officers had 16 cooks and 16 bakers."

Kendall spent nearly an hour with the board. He left this thought with its members:

"The human spirit has grown larger since the time of Frederick the Great, but Army discipline still is cast to the servile mind of the 18th Century peasant."

Having Civilian to Hear G.I.'s Complaints Would Help, Louisvillian Tells Caste Board

By ROBERT L. RIGGS.

The Courier-Journal Washington Bureau.

Washington, April 3.—A former G.I. from Louisville told the Army's gripe board today that it would take a long step toward eliminating discontent among enlisted men if it would remove the inspector general's department from the Army and make it a civilian unit responsible directly to the Secretary of War.

The witness before Lt. Gen. James Doolittle's board was former M/Sgt Glenn G. Kendall, 39, of 2040 Douglass Boulevard, telegraph editor of The Courier-Journal.

The enlisted man has plenty of rights under Army regulations, Kendall said, but he cannot achieve them so long as he has to make his appeals for redress to an inspector general who is an Army officer.

"The Army long ago handed

Glenn Kendall, C.-J. Telegraph Editor,

Says Enlisted Men Should Be Taught Right down its Dred Scott Decision that the enlisted man had no rights that the officer is bound to respect," Kendall said. "What is needed is an inspector general's department which will give quick redress to the soldier who has just found out that they can't make you do it, but they can make you wish you had."

Kendall told the board he favored a big Army and universal service, but "not until the draftee is able to keep his self-respect." What robs the enlisted man of his self-respect, he said, is the feeling that the Army deliberately sets out to degrade him, to make him regard himself as an inferior person. Most men do not object to discipline, he said.

"The attitude to which I object most," Kendall said, "is a commonly held one that an enlisted man should be denied certain things, or compelled to do certain things, not because they are essential to discipline, but simply because he is an enlisted man."

Not 'Entitled to Comfort.'

"Two weeks after the Eighth Army landed on Leyte, we were still in pup tents, with all our stuff. Squad tents and cots for the officers had gone up the first day. Our squawks reached the headquarters commandant.

"To a meeting of noncommissioned officers, he said: 'It never occurred to me that enlisted men were entitled to any comfort. Enlisted men slept on the ground in the last war and they can sleep on the ground in this one.'

"We didn't mind sleeping water. We had done it in midwinter in Tennessee when it was necessary. We objected to being denied cots, which were available, just because they were good for us.

"Before denying anything enlisted men, the Army should ask itself: 'Is this being done just because they're enlisted men?' Is there a good reason for it?"

Should Be Taught Rights.

On the point of a civilian inspector general, Kendall said:

"The enlisted man now has the right to go to the inspector general, but he's afraid of him. A good inspector general won't have much trouble with this, but a stuffed shirt will—and many inspectors generals are stuffed shirts."

"After graduating from Western, I went to Midshipman's School at Northwestern University and was commissioned on October 28, 1943. I received orders to report in San Diego, California, on November 20, for a ten-weeks training period in torpedoes. I like the Navy very much; and if I have any success in it, it will be largely an outcome of what I learned at Western." writes James R. Kindell, class of '43.

Wearing his "pair of silver wings," Lieutenant Lester Keyes of the Army Air Corps was a welcome sight to many upperclassmen when he visited the campus during the Homecoming festivities. Lieutenant Keyes left school last December to enter the Air Corps as an aviation cadet and subsequently came to wear those coveted wings of an Army Air Corps navigator. While at Western, Lieutenant Keyes was a member of the R. O. T. C. and was completing his senior year when called to training.

Captain William R. King, Stanford, a graduate of Western Teachers College, and a former high school principal in Lincoln county, is known to the U. S. Army Thirteenth Air Force as Captain King, but to the Polynesian-Melanesian natives of a South Pacific island, he is "Chief Captain Goodheart."
The title was given him by the grand chief of the tribe, and so far, his most exacting duty as "Chief Captain Goodheart" has been attendance as honored guest at the native feast which followed the wedding of the grand chief's son. Capt. King, formerly a vocational agriculture instructor in the Lincoln county schools, and area supervisor of the W. P. A. adult education program, is in charge of native laborers
