Student paper titled "The Lucas Homestead: A Study of Traditional Farm Structures" in which Martha Spinks investigates the origins and functions of a Sand Hill farm owned by Herschel Lucas in Warren County, Kentucky. The structure, which was constructed by Luther Parrish in 1820, began as a single-pen log cabin; however, additional units, such as a smoke house, storage rooms, bedrooms, and a chimney, were built by succeeding owners. Spinks also describes materials used during the construction of the main building and other outlying structures, describes the purpose of several locations on the property, and includes black and white photographs of the homestead itself.
