Next at Western: no empire-builder

Kern Alexander is leaving Western Kentucky University to take a prestigious professorship at Virginia Polytechnic Institute. His departure offers Western's regents an opportunity to reconsider just what sort of leadership their institution needs.

Alexander's 30 months at Western were characterized by controversy. The controversies began when he hired a dozen administrators without posting the jobs publicly. They continued when he decided it would be a good idea to move Robert Penn Warren's boyhood home from Guthrie to Bowling Green, but neglected to ask Warren what he thought of the idea.

The controversies mounted when he announced an expanded community college program at nearby Glasgow. And they reached a crescendo when Alexander proposed new rules for Western's student publications.

Alexander and his supporters say that these controversies simply indicate that Alexander had a problem communicating his ideas, and perhaps that is so. Whatever his flaws, Alexander did bring to Western a love of the institution and a vision of what the institution could become.

But Alexander's leadership foun-dered because that vision was simply not compatible with the nature of Western's mission. Like too many presidents of Kentucky public universities, Alexander looked at his school and saw an empire to be built. Perhaps the realization that no such empire was in the cards helped him decide to return to the quieter life of teaching and research. Western and the other regional universities need strong, visionary leadership. But their leaders' visions must mesh with the reality of those institutions.

The regions, with their roles in undergraduate education and public service, are critically important to Kentucky's future. But these institutions are not empires waiting to be built, and any president who does not accept that cannot succeed. That's something for the Western regents to bear in mind as they begin the search for Alexander's successor.

WKU publications review will continue

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. (AP) — Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander will remain "active and involved" in a controversial review of student publications, despite his imminent departure, an assistant to the president said.

Stephen House, executive assistant to the president, said Tuesday that Alexander has asked Nancy Green, publisher of the Palladium-Item of Richmond, Ind., and former student-publications adviser at the University of Kentucky, to continue the review.

House said Alexander hopes the publications review will be completed by August. He also said Alexander plans to appoint a panel of professionals to review Ms. Green's recommendations and findings.

Ms. Green said Alexander asked her to come up with ideas for the publications. "I was not given any specific instructions about the outcome of what I was to do," she said.

Alexander, WKU president since 1985, created a storm of controversy March 15 when he announced plans to install faculty editors at the College Heights Herald and the Talisman, the school's award-winning student newspaper and yearbook.

He announced Monday that he will leave to take a distinguished professorship at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in Blacksburg, Va. He said he tentatively plans to leave July 1, but that he will stay on as president until the WKU regents name a replacement.

Ms. Green, too, expressed hope that the review will continue. "If it's allowed to drop, a lot of questions will remain unanswered," she said.

Ms. Green said she is waiting to get information from the university about publications policies, operations, staffing and oversight before she interviews faculty members and students.

She hopes to be able to submit her recommendations by mid-May, she said.

Ms. Green's ideas will be reviewed by a panel of about 10 professional journalists and educators, who have not yet been appointed, House said.

Robert Adams, the Herald's faculty adviser and the interim director of student publications, said he does not think Alexander's decision to leave will have a significant impact on the review.

"I don't think anything detrimental to the newspaper will happen between now and the time the president leaves," he said.

The review began with a committee meeting March 19, at which Alexander announced that he wanted faculty editors installed at the Herald and Talisman, which now are edited by students. He also said he wanted students to get academic credit for work on the papers and a faculty and student advisory committee to have greater involvement in the publications.

Alexander formed a sub-committee to draw up the details for implementing his proposals. The reaction from faculty members — in journalism and other disciplines — students and professionals was negative.

Students marched on the administration building in protest, and the Society of Professional Journalists sent a fact-finding team to campus.

That panel concluded that "it is impossible to tell if President Alexander really did want to control student publications (and) turn the newspaper into a mouthpiece." But it said, "Prompt reaction and loud cries may have scared off a potential censor."

Alexander, who steadfastly maintained that he had accountability, not censorship, in mind, backed away from his original proposals and gave the sub-committee leeway in addressing his concerns. In its report, dated March 31, the sub-committee did not recommend faculty editors or academic credit, and proposed a more limited role for the advisory committee.
KPA opposes restrictions on WKU journalism

The Kentucky Press Association Board of Directors has unanimously endorsed a resolution that states the proposed changes in the journalism department and publications at Western Kentucky University would be detrimental to the integrity of the program. The resolution was adopted at a KPA board meeting March 24 in Louisville. A copy of the resolution was sent to Dr. Kern Alexander, president, Western Kentucky University.

KPA opposes changes in WKU journalism department

The board of directors of the Kentucky Press Association gave its “wholehearted endorsement and approval” March 25 to a resolution opposing proposed changes in the journalism program at Western Kentucky University. The Kentucky Press Association Board of Directors adopted a resolution on March 24 that it “vigorously opposes” any changes in the journalism program at Western that threaten the independence of the College Heights Herald, the student newspaper, and the Talisman, the school’s yearbook.

The resolution, adopted by no apparent danger of censorship.

Dr. Kern Alexander, president of Western Kentucky University, was in Tampa, Fla., on Friday and Saturday, March 18 and 19, to assume the presidency of the National Education Finance Association (NEFA). Alexander’s term of office is for the 1988-89 year.

The NEFA and its predecessor, the Conference of Education Finance of the National Education Association, is in its 34th year. The organization, whose membership is made up of professors, educational administrators, legislators, and legislative staff, provides a national forum for discussion of issues regarding the economics and financing of elementary, secondary, and higher education.

The organization publishes and distributes educational materials including a yearbook which Alexander edited this year entitled “Attracting and Compensating America’s Teachers.”
Censorship at WKU unlikely, panel says

From Page B1

as for changes in the College Heights Herald newspaper and the Talisman yearbook.
Alexander on March 15 told a committee reviewing the publications that he wanted changes, including a faculty and student committee to prepare a budget for both publications and a faculty editor for the newspaper.

The paper has a faculty adviser, but students run the paper and control its content.

Some students and faculty members — along with professional journalists and journalism organizations around the country — reacted angrily. They feared the proposals would result in administrative control of the paper and a stifling of its ability to cover the university.

The review panel concluded that the "prompt reaction and loud cries" might have "scared off a potential censor" by causing Alexander to back away from a move to control the student newspaper.

The paper has covered Alexander and the university aggressively, and its relations with the president have been strained.

Attempts to reach Alexander for reaction yesterday were unsuccessful.

But he has insisted since the controversy erupted that his goal was never to censor the student newspaper or yearbook, calling censorship "obnoxious."

Alexander has said the furor resulted from inaccurate news media reports about his proposal.

The panel reviewed news reports and concluded otherwise.

McMasters said the report concluded that news stories "did not contribute to the problem," but rather that any problems were "due to Alexander and his pronouncements."

Alexander's apparent shifting is one reason for continued concern that censorship still might be possible, McMasters said.

"There's some concern that he might stumble back into this thick," McMasters said.

The report said students and faculty should watch to ensure that Alexander's call for more financial accountability does not hurt the board's ability to report the news and editorialize.

The panel's report also urged Alexander to review the lessons of the controversy, among them, "Get the facts before moving."

The report to McMasters was compiled by Robert K. Thorp, a former University of Kentucky journalism professor and retired Louisville Times copy editor; James Tidwell, associate journalism professor at Eastern Illinois University; and Laura Epper Hill, publications adviser at Vanderbilt University and former reporter at The Tennessean in Nashville.

By Bill Estep

South-central Kentucky bureau

Changes sought by Western Kentucky University President Kem Alexander almost certainly will not result in censorship of the student-press publication, a panel representing a national society of journalists concluded.

-- The censorship issue, at this point, is pretty well dead," said Paul McMasters of USA Today, who received the group's report yesterday. Concern about possible censorship of the newspaper and yearbook has been at the core of a two-week controversy on the Bowling Green campus.

"The panel traced the controversy to Alexander's seeming inability to "get across what he said he wanted to say," and apparent shifts in his position as the controversy evolved, McMasters said.

McMasters is a deputy editorial director for USA Today and chairman of the National Freedom of Information Office of The Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

The society, the nation's largest organization of professional journalists, sent a three-member panel to Bowling Green to review proposals.

(Turn to CENSORSHIP, B2)
Controversy nothing new for Western's Alexander

By Bill Estep
South-central Kentucky bureau

Bowling Green — Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander's proposal to install faculty editors for the Talisman yearbook and College Heights Herald newspaper has sparked controversy in his two-year tenure.

Soon after his arrival, Alexander appointed 11 administrators without posting the positions, causing considerable faculty unrest. Then he announced plans to purchase and move the publication's offices, a panel representing a national society of journalists said.

The problem, some faculty members say, may simply be Alexander's inability to communicate his intentions.

"What he says he intends to say is not the message people are getting," said Eugene Evans, the faculty regent.

"We don't seem to be skillful enough in sending our message to the public," Evans added. "There is not enough thought given to the impact our statements are going to have."

Alexander, 48, was appointed Western's seventh president in December 1985 amid great hope and enthusiasm. He immediately announced plans to reverse the decline in student enrollment — and he has succeeded.

According to university figures, enrollment has increased from 11,259 in fall 1985 to 13,520 last fall, and the average ACT score of freshmen has improved from 18.8 to 19.1 over the same period.

More than that, said Fred Murphy, chairman of the Faculty Senate and

WKU censorship highly unlikely, panel says

From Page B1

The panel traced the controversy to Alexander's seeming inability to "get across what he said he wanted to say" and apparent shifts in his position as the controversy evolved, McMasters said.

McMasters is a deputy editorial director for USA Today and chairman of the National Freedom of Information Office of The Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

The society, the nation's largest organization of professional journalists, sent a three-member panel to Bowling Green to review proposals for changes in the College Heights Herald newspaper and Talisman yearbook.

Alexander on March 15 told a committee reviewing the publications that he wanted changes, including a faculty and student committee to prepare a budget for both publications and a faculty editor for the newspaper.

The newspaper has a faculty adviser, but student editors run the paper and control its content.

Some students and faculty members along with professional journalists and journalism organizations around the country — reacted angrily. They feared the proposals would result in administrative control of the paper and stifling of its ability to cover the university.

The review panel concluded that the "prompt reaction and loud cries" might have "scared off a potential censor" by causing Alexander to back away from a move to control the student newspaper.

The paper has covered Alexander and the university aggressively, and its relations with the president have been strained.

Attempts to reach Alexander for reaction yesterday were unsuccessful.

But he has insisted since the Alexander's plans raise questions

Editor's note: The following is a roundup of editorials published by Kentucky newspapers on a variety of issues of interest to Kentucky residents.

Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander recently expressed the fact that he wants to see expanded faculty and administrative involvement in the school's nationally-recognized student newspaper (College Heights Herald) and yearbook (Talisman). Because proposed changes would result in little changes in the way the publications are now being run.

Ironically, last November, a faculty committee Alexander instructed to review student publications recommended no substantial changes be made in the operations of either publication.

As we see it, limiting the freedom and creative abilities of the press, or even proposing changes that appear to suggest such offenses, is a serious and questionable course of action to be taken by any college president.

Our stance coincides with that of a profound adage..."If it ain't broke, why fix it?"

— Murray Ledger & Times

Editorials from around Kentucky

WKU's student paper ain't broke, so...

Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander recently expressed the fact that he wants to see expanded faculty and administrative involvement in the school's nationally-recognized student newspaper (College Heights Herald) and yearbook (Talisman). Because proposed changes would result in the appointment of faculty editors, reports are classifying his actions as an attempt to muzzle the feisty publication.

We, too, see the move as an unnecessary one...

According to Alexander, the implementation of such positions would result in little changes in the way the publications are now being run.

KPA board attacks

Western president

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. (AP) — The Kentucky Press Association has criticized Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander's original proposals for changing two student publications.

The KPA's executive board, in a resolution approved Thursday, said the proposals were detrimental to the integrity of the university's journalism program.

They also would damage the employability of Western journalism graduates, the resolution said.

Alexander has proposed replacing faculty advisers with faculty editors, who would then choose the student editors.

Western's board of regents scheduled a special session today to discuss Alexander's recommendations.

Board Chairman Joe Iracane said the meeting is "to set the record straight" about the College Heights Herald newspaper and the Talisman yearbook.

KPA criticizes

WKU proposals

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. (AP) — The Kentucky Press Association has criticized Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander's original proposals for changing two student publications.

The KPA's executive board, in a resolution approved Thursday, said the proposals were detrimental to the integrity of the university's journalism program.
Press association criticizes proposals on WKU media

Associated Press

BOWLING GREEN — The Kentucky Press Association has criticized Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander's original proposals for changing two student publications.

The KPA's executive board, in a resolution approved Thursday, said the proposals were detrimental to the integrity of the university's journalism program.

They also would damage the employability of Western journalism graduates, the resolution said.

Western's board of regents scheduled a special session today to discuss Alexander's proposals.

Board Chairman Joe Iracane said the meeting was "to set the record straight" about the College Heights Herald and the Talisman yearbook.

The national chapter of The Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, sent a fact-finding committee to Western this week to examine the proposals and see whether the intent was to stifle the student media.

Don't tamper with WKU publications

The Daily News, Middlesboro:
News item: Study reveals tax forms harder to read than Wall Street Journal.

With April 15 looming, that's not-so-good news for many of us, especially here in southeast Kentucky where we have the state's highest dropout rate and among Kentucky's highest incidences of adult illiteracy.

According to the study, nine of 10 Americans with less than a high school education can't understand the instructions of the simplest tax form, the 1040EZ, let alone the complications of the 1040 and itemizing deductions....

Of people with some college background (the survey said) — less than two years — 50.2 percent were able to make sense of the instructions.

And those with at least two years of college fared best at 82.8 percent.

Unless quick action is taken, those that can least afford a tax penalty, the low-income earner and those on a fixed-income, will be hardest hit by the so-called new tax laws.

Taxation is supposed to be a fair process, not an exercise in contributing to poverty. Under the new laws and the IRS' penchant for penalizing the little man, the only winner is government.

While it gets richer, we get poorer. At this rate you can kiss the American dream goodbye.

REGIONAL ROUNDUP

EDITED BY WAYNE WELLS

Regents to discuss WKU newspaper

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. — The Western Kentucky University Board of Regents will meet at 11 a.m. today to discuss plans by WKU president Kern Alexander to increase faculty and administrative involvement in the student newspaper and yearbook.

The meeting "will set the record straight," said Regent Chairman Joe Iracane.

In meetings with faculty and students this week, Alexander said he is no longer suggesting the imposition of faculty editors for the two award-winning publications.

That and other proposals Alexander outlined last week led to a storm of protest from faculty and students and from journalists around the country.

The Kentucky Press Association yesterday passed a resolution calling Alexander's original proposals "detrimental to the integrity of the Western Kentucky University journalism program and its student publications...."

The press association also said the proposals would harm the employment prospects of the WKU journalism students.

Berry's World

LIFESTYLES OF THE RICH AND INFAMOUS

Daily News

Founded by the late JOHN B. GAINES
C. M. Gaines, Publisher from 1922 to 1947
Daily News founded in 1882; Democrat founded in 1854; Messenger founded in 1906
Consolidated January 1, 1917

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper as well as all AP news dispatches.
WKU officials say newspaper guidelines not censorship effort

WKU head pledges no censorship

He characterized the proposals as part of the normal development of administrative policies at Western. The new guidelines were misinterpreted in attempts at censorship, he said.

"It took quite a leap to go from there to censorship," Alexander said. "The plan was to document what we did in the past so we would know what we are able to do in the future. That protects the student press." If there is any danger to the student press, or freedom of any kind of press, it is not having written procedures that everyone should abide by.

Ms. Albers said she was still concerned, after all the discussion of the need for documentation, that Alexander had not put in writing that he did not intend for the new policies to affect the content of the newspaper.

---

WKU board, president repudiate censorship

By Kit Waglar

BOWLING GREEN — Regents of Western Kentucky University pledged yesterday that proposed guidelines for the student newspaper and yearbook would never allow "the slightest hint of censorship."

"We wanted to lay to rest the concern about the newspaper," said Joseph Iracane, board chairman.

The regents held a special meeting yesterday to address the controversy, which has attracted nationwide attention over the fate of Western's student newspaper, the College Heights Herald.

The regents approved a resolution supporting university President Kern Alexander's efforts to establish new guidelines for the Herald and the Talisman, the yearbook.

But the resolution also promised that the guidelines would "protect the quality of the newspaper's content and the integrity of the newspaper's content."

Jo-Ann Albers, head of Western's journalism department, said during a break in the meeting that she felt better hearing Alexander's latest position.

"I'm more optimistic now because he's gone public with his willingness to be flexible about the things I was concerned about," Ms. Albers said. "I feel that we can come up with a set of recommendations that are acceptable to administrators, journalism department, the Herald and to the professors."

She warned, however, that no one could be sure the guidelines would be adopted until they were adopted and set in motion.

A group studying the issue is expected to make its recommendations this week, Thursday, Ms. Albers said.

During yesterday's meeting, individual regents echoed her comments.

"I feel 100 percent sure that none of these recommendations contain the least hint of censorship," regent Pat Sykes said.

Eugene Evans, a student regent, said he would have to see the plan before reacting to it. "These are legitimate concerns," Evans said. "This has been a bit embarrassing to the university. But it would be more embarrassing if no questions were asked."

The controversy stems from a March 15 meeting at which Alexander told a committee studying the organization of university publications that he wanted several changes, including a faculty editor assigned to the newspaper.

The newspaper now has a faculty adviser, but editorial decisions are left to the students.

Alexander said yesterday that he never intended the faculty editor to censor the newspaper. The faculty editor would have the same role as the faculty advisor, but with a formal job description.

The possibility that the proposals would stifle the student newspaper drew criticism from media groups across the nation.

The American Society of Newspaper Editors approved a resolution criticizing the proposals. The 600 members of the College Media Advisers group passed a resolution saying they "deplore this shotgun attempt at muzzling a quality student newspaper."

Alexander said yesterday that the new guidelines were designed only to provide written documentation of past practices, give the publications a spot in the university hierarchy, and provide a formal process to adopt a budget.

The changes will strengthen the newspaper's independence by eliminating administrating from the university's publications committee, which oversees the Herald and the Talisman, Alexander said.

---

WKU won't censor student publications

150 students protest against call for faculty supervision

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. — Faculty supervision of Western Kentucky University student publications will be extended to editorial control, school President Kern Alexander said Wednesday.

"I don't know how the school president's recommendations also made a speech Tuesday, said the issue had been clouded by a lack of communication between the students and the administration."

"That's one of the reasons we decided to go on with this demonstration even after your speech," Ely said. "We felt there were a lot of positive comments made in your speech yesterday. And we felt you had some good things to say about the Herald and what you want to do. And we also feel that if we had backed down from this demonstration that would only prove that the students are indeed apathetic and don't care.

Some students, faculty members and professional journalists criticized earlier statements by Alexander that suggested school administration take control over the story selection and content of the yearbook winning College Heights Herald.

A fact-finding committee of the National Society of Professional Journalists is examining the relationship between the administration and the publications.

Alexander said he would let journalists from outside the campus examine the faculty committee's finished report.

Alexander has proposed more detailed guidelines for the newspaper and yearbook and suggested that they be assigned faculty editors.

"The reason I used the term 'editor' was because the committee which made the report ... used the term 'editor' rather loosely," he said.
A bit of wisdom from the ancients

As most folks in this part of the world know by now, Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander has proposed radical changes in the way the school’s newspaper, the College Heights Herald, is to be run in the future. One of the changes involves replacing student editors with faculty editors. Alexander says the administration has no plans to censor, muzzle or otherwise exert inappropriate influence on the often-controversial newspaper, which has sometimes disagreed with his notions.

Nobody questions Alexander’s intelligence, his status or his prominence in educational circles. But lots of people, both inside and outside the media, are questioning his judgement, and with good reason. (It is scarcely worth noting that Joe Iracane, chairman of WKU’s Board of Regents, agrees with Alexander, since Iracane has become so adept at parroting the university president that any time he opens his mouth I expect him to ask if Polly wants a cracker.)

A fellow named Homer had this to say about 850 B.C.: “A noble mind never does. And another that says a man who won’t change his mind under any circumstances is a slave to his own opinions. And yet another that says the only man who can change his mind is the man who has one. Dr. Alexander, who has a fine mind, should change it. He’s the only one I know of who has any problem with the College Heights Herald. The paper does have faculty advisors who have always done a credible job keeping the student publication out of serious trouble.”

Support for WKU

The student newspaper of the outstanding journalism school at Western Kentucky University has been in the headlines itself during the past week.

WKU President Kern Alexander has decided to install faculty editors to edit the students’ work before publication. That’s a new and unacceptable procedure at WKU’s student newspaper, the College Heights Herald.

The award-winning publication has helped train a large number of excellent writers and advertising people over the years, several of whom have labored at The Sentinel-News. We employed two Western seniors as interns last summer.

WKU has for several years been the leading journalism school in the state and nearly all those students have earned their hands-on experience with the College Heights Herald. The paper does have faculty advisors who have always done a credible job keeping the student publication out of serious trouble.

The controversy can only harm WKU’s President and should be resolved as quickly as possible while making sure fears of censorship are allayed.

President Alexander has not clearly stated his reasons for changing to a faculty editing setup at WKU, but we hope he will realize that throwing the First Amendment out the window is not in the best interest of his university.

Editorial

The uproar began after a review of the publications by an ad hoc committee appointed by Alexander.

Alexander said the committee did not go far enough in addressing administrative organization, academic attachment or financial responsibility of the publications.

He then gave a subcommittee of the ad hoc committee the responsibility for implementing changes he believes are needed.

Critics charge Alexander’s plans would result in editorial control of the publications by the administration. Alexander says, however, that censorship is not intended.

He says it actually would be prevented by making sure the publications director reports to someone, such as the dean of Potter College, who would act as a buffer between the publications director and the president.

Before the current interim publications director, Bob Adams, took over, the publications director had reported to the office of the vice president for academic affairs.

It is important that such publications remain the voice of the students rather than of the administration, while at the same time assuring more financial responsibility and the best professional training possible.
Alexander remains firm on newspaper issue

BOWLING GREEN, KY. (AP) — Western Kentucky University President K ern Alexander said he will not back down from his decision that there needs to be more administrative control over the school's student newspaper and yearbook.

Alexander told the Faculty Senate on Tuesday that he was beginning to have second thoughts about pursuing the matter earlier in the day, but that he is sticking with his decision.

"I don't think that we're doing anything wrong here. We've got a faculty committee meeting to earnestly discuss this," he said. "I think we should continue and go with the faculty committee's recommendations."

Alexander did soften a bit and said that a group of outside journalists would be allowed to review the committee's finished report.

Talk of Alexander's possible changes in the running of the award-winning College Heights Herald, the student publication, and the Talisman, the WKU yearbook, has drawn criticism from professional journalists, students and some faculty.

The national Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, has put together a fact-finding committee to look into Alexander's proposals and the relationship between the administration and the publication.

Alexander's remarks came on the eve of today's planned student demonstration against the proposed changes, which was to include a march on the administration building.

Alexander has proposed that faculty editors be assigned to the publications, which now have faculty advisers, and student editors. The students now have authority over what goes into the newspaper and its editorial content.

Under Alexander's plan, the faculty editors would then select student editors, who currently are selected by their predecessors and faculty advisers.

"The problem is there are no rules, no regulations, no operating standards for university publications," Alexander told the Bowling Green Daily News prior to the meeting.

"The criticism is coming from several of those who just do not want any rules. That's what the outcry is against."

Alexander said he is flexible on some of his proposals, including one to offer academic credit for working on the newspapers, which now are independent from classroom activities. But he said he will remain firm on setting forth a detailed budget and a chain of command for the student publications.

"There's $100,000 to $200,000 a year coming into student publications and it comes in and is just signed out; there's no budget and no financial constraints. What we need is a financial plan and review."

However, Robert Adams, the Herald adviser and interim director of publications, said the department fills out a university budget request form each year and submits it to the dean of the Potter College of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences.

WKU students to demonstrate against plan

BOWLING GREEN (AP) — Students at Western Kentucky University plan a demonstration Wednesday to protest a proposal that critics say would place more administrative control over the college's yearbook and newspaper.

The all-day demonstration at the Dero Downing University Center is being organized by theater and government students, who fear their departments may suffer if university President Kern Alexander is successful in his plan for the College Heights Herald and the Talisman.

"If Dr. Alexander can do this to the Herald, he can do this to any department," said Bruce Cambron, a government and history student.

"He's going to limit the education of everyone on campus," said Melissa Cornett, a government student. "Everybody will lose out."

The demonstration will include a march on the administration building.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the college's board of regents, has blamed The Courier-Journal for the public outcry over Alexander's proposal to assign faculty editors for the publications, which now have faculty advisers. The faculty editors then would select student editors, who have been selected by their predecessors and faculty advisers.
A difference

A young and impressionable filly said Sunday that many in her age group (obviously young) wished they had been in high school and college in the 1960s. Everything was so relevant then, she suggested.

The time didn't make relevancy, people do.

Ronald Reagan is capable of sending people into the streets in protest, just like Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon. He hasn't done that yet because his actions haven't touched the lives of enough young Americans.

The demonstrators I saw on television Friday night were old hippies like me who haven't had much to get upset about in 20 years.

Sending troops to Central America, however, seems little reason to protest. Maybe I am getting older and more conservative, but actually a little muscle flexing seems in order.

If times were different, and young Americans by the hundreds of thousands were being sent to fight an undeclared war, then I'd say that was relevant.

Now, about things that ARE relevant. Freedom of the press. If the Supreme Court's misguided decision that school publications may be censured by administrators wasn't bad enough, Western Kentucky University president has decided to target one of the southeastern United States' best campus journalism efforts for some administrative intrusion.

WKU President Kern Alexander wants faculty editors for the college newspaper and yearbook. He wants stories in the College Heights Herald reviewed before they are published. The campus newspaper has been critical of Alexander in recent stories and his latest edict smacks of some heavy-handedness which would have sent "my generation" into the streets.

Civil disobedience is by no means acceptable to me anymore. But, unresponsive bureaucrats, careless public management, irresponsible elected officials, and generally uncaring people cause me to feel young again, like I did when it was 1968 and Mayor Daley ruled Chicago and the Democrat national convention.

America changed 20 years ago, and may be ripe for another change today as a generation of yippie kids park their BMWs and laugh at their parents' self-centered approach to life.

Wish it were the 1960s again? Not me. I really believe "the times, they are changin'."

And, if not me, my children will make a difference in this world.

Perhaps my greatest handicap has been that I never gave up trying nor believed that one person can't make a difference.

I see some of that hard headed youthful optimism today and it gives me hope.
THEIR similar-sounding names are a coincidence, but once again a pronouncement from Kern Alexander brings to mind lines from Kubla Khan:

Beware! Beware!
His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread.

Now that the Western Kentucky University president has staked out a second campus near where Barren, the sacred river, runs, he is plunging across the plain and over the mighty Ohio River, to Carbondale. There he plans to build a "cooperative" arrangement with Southern Illinois University that will let Western students begin work on doctoral programs in Bowling Green.

No matter that SIU is 225 miles away. No matter that similar arrangements could be made with Kentucky schools. No matter that Western students may have more urgent academic needs than another route to a Ph.D.

Instead of doctorates, one might expect Western to concentrate on its graduate program in, say, business, which has never been accredited. Wouldn't that be a higher priority in a rapidly growing area like Bowling Green? Instead, Western is phasing out its M.B.A.

Free-lancing an arrangement with SIU flies in the face of endless efforts to insure that Kentucky has a coordinated system of higher education. Expansion of any public institution should come as part of an orderly process overseen by the Council on Higher Education, not as a result of power grabs by people who may be more aggressive and less collegial than their peers.

This is the lesson for the WKU board, which seems to have clucked approvingly as Mr. Alexander pecked at new territories.

Ultimately, the analogy with Kubla Kahn is not so apt. The earlier Kubla was a mighty and effective warrior; whereas Kern Alexander has been a banty rooster of a president. But he's leaving Western. It's morning in Bowling Green. We bid him cock-a-doodle-doo.
Disagreement proves truth of press adage

If the truth were told, I suspect Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander would acknowledge the accuracy of the adage that one ought not pick a fight with people who buy paper by the ton and ink by the barrel. Surely Alexander didn't understand that old saying which means you don't win a fight with a newspaper.

Or else, maybe he just didn't believe it when a few weeks ago he attempted to muzzle The College Heights Herald, the university's award-winning student newspaper.

"Anyhow, now he's going—leaving Western to accept a distinguished professorship in Virginia—and the Herald has emerged from the scrap stronger than ever.

Certainly Alexander's proposal to put faculty editors in charge of the paper earned him a lot of ink from other papers from around the country—and none of them had anything good to say about him.

The Courier-Journal devoted a tremendous amount of paper and ink to his proposals. Other papers, too, picked up the story and kept it alive.

I quit counting at 94. That's the number of separate articles, editorials and letters to the editor I saw on the subject as it unfolded over about a three-week period.

Editor & Publisher, the voice of the publishing industry, devoted an unprecedented three and a half pages to the issue.

The Kentucky Press Association, College Media Advisors, Inc., of New York and Western Kentucky University Student Publications Alumni Association passed resolutions deploiring Alexander's plan.

Students staged a 1960s-style protest rally in support of the Herald and publications department.

A three-member investigative panel from Sigma Delta Chi, Society of Professional Journalists, spent two days on the campus interviewing people about the controversy.

Its final report was that it was "impossible to tell if Alexander really did want to control student publications and turn the newspaper into a mouthpiece" but that "prompt reaction and loud cries may have scared off a potential censor."

The current publications director also served notice he was considering a slander suit for remarks Alexander had made over a Bowling Green radio station.

In addition to naming faculty editors for the university's twice weekly newspaper and its yearbook, he also proposed changing budgeting procedures and awarding academic credit for working on the publications.

We cannot help but wonder at what point Alexander realized he had reached out and grabbed a tiger by which he could not let go without creating a monster.

It was probably at about the time he began denying published reports he was considering taking the Virginia job.

The trouble between Alexander and the Herald began not long after he arrived on campus in 1985.

The Herald, picked a couple of years back as the nation's best college newspaper, apparently wasn't the lap dog Alexander thought it should be.

The staff, which is sought out by papers all across the country as fast as members graduate, had a troublesome knack for reporting and editorializing.

It was at best lukewarm to several of Alexander's pet projects.

Among them were buying and moving the birthplace of nationally noted poet Robert Penn Warren from Guthrie in Todd County to Bowling Green.

Continued on Page Two
Conflict shows truth of adage

Continued from Page One

The residents of Guthrie objected to the Bowling Green campus. The students of Guthrie objected to Alexander's proposal to open a branch campus at Glasgow, which is only 30 miles from Bowling Green. So, perhaps, it should have come as not much of a surprise that the student newspaper also questioned the wisdom of Alexander's proposal to waste millions of taxpayers' dollars on another recreational facility at Western at a time academics is crying out for more money. The Herald, impudent beast that it is, also questioned the Campus censorship charged

Students and faculty say university president wants to control publications; he says they have nothing to worry about

By Allan Wolper

Carrying homemade signs and chanting their support for free speech, a group calling itself Students for a Free Press led more than 200 people through the center of the Western Kentucky University campus in Bowling Green.

Standing nearby, WKU president Kem Alexander waited until the students finished their rally and then told them they had nothing to worry about.

"Censorship is obnoxious to the press, it's obnoxious to me and it's obnoxious to you," he insisted in a March 24 forum with the protestors.

Alexander's speech reportedly won some converts in the emotional gathering, but he is still being criticized for what faculty and students believe was a blatant attempt to grab editorial control of the student newspaper.

- The Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, has drafted a report that severely criticizes Alexander for damaging the reputation of the highly rated journalism department.
- Two journalism professors—one retired and the other the current faculty adviser to the paper — say they are consulting with lawyers on whether to sue Alexander for slander.
- Journalists are worried that their outspoken opposition to Alexander's proposals might provoke some administrative reprisal.
- Alexander, speaking from notes, introduced his controversial plan at a March 15 meeting of a faculty advisory committee to the College Heights Herald, the campus paper, and The Talisman yearbook.

Alexander said he wanted the two publications to be run by faculty editors, a recommendation that the journalism faculty and student editors felt was an attempt to take over the paper.

The publications now have faculty advisers, but are run by the student editors.

He also said he wanted to give staffers academic credit for their work instead of the $45 biweekly paychecks the most senior members now receive.

Student journalists felt that getting marks from faculty could hurt the paper's integrity.

Finally, Alexander proposed expanding a four-member advisory committee of faculty and students that would meet at least once a semester to help select the editor of the paper.

The student members, he advised, should be chosen by the president of the student government, Tim Todd, who had been feuding with the College Heights Herald.

The students felt that an intrusive committee could stifle their independence.

Sitting in at the meeting were Tim Roberts, a reporter for the Louisville Courier-Journal, Toya Richards, a reporter for the Herald, and Carla Harris, the editor of the campus paper.

Harris saw the proposals as a way to quiet the paper that had published a variety of hard-hitting stories that had embarrassed the 25-month-old Alexander administration.

"There's a definite relation between what he did today and what we've written about him in the past," she told the Courier-Journal.

Herald articles included:
- A story disclosing that school officials failed to meet with members of the Board of Regents before proposing to build a satellite campus at Glasgow and then overstating the number of students who would enroll there.
- A reprinted editorial from the Courier-Journal on the Glasgow situation that identified Kem Alexander as Kublai Kern.
- A story that began when a reporter read a memo that was sitting on an administrator's desk, confirmed it and produced a story that said the university had lost a state commitment for a special grant.

(Continued on page 12)
Campus
(Continued from page 11)

- An editorial against Alexander's decision to cancel a first-round tournament basketball game against Kentucky Wesleyan, an NCAA small
nament basketball game against Ken-

said the university had lost a state college champion, so WKU would commitment for a special grant.
- An editorial and cartoon noting that Alexander failed to appear at a special budget meeting between the state's university presidents and Gov.
Wallace Wilkinson.
- A five-paragraph story last January in the back of the paper that reported on Alexander's divorce. The story was a follow-up of information that appeared in a profile of Alexander in the Lexington Herald-Leader.

Alexander said he wanted the two publications to be run by faculty editors, a recommendation that the journalism faculty and student editors felt was an attempt to take over the paper.

Carla Harris said in an interview that the staff member assigned to the story called Alexander's former wife in Florida to confirm the story and spoke to one of his sons.

After the story ran, King Alexander, Kern Alexander's son, stormed into the Herald newsroom to warn Robert Adams, the faculty adviser, to stop bothering his family.

"Mister A [Adams] didn't know the Journalism Department and a member of that faculty group, said that "every reference in that original report referred to student editors.
That's all we talked about. Students." Albers said, however, that the Courier-Journal overstated the faculty reaction to Alexander. "It wasn't an outright rejection," she said. "His story, however, was a fair
representation of what happened."

The Courier-Journal story, picked up by the wire services, launched the troversy.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Board of Regents, accused the journalism department of creating the impression that Alexander wanted to censor the school paper.

"When they tipped off the Courier-
Journal, that implied that censorship
was an issue," Iracane charged in a telephone interview.

"I think that they [the journalism
faculty] were concerned about selfish motives," he said. "Do you think that the Courier-Journal would have covered that meeting if we were going to delete 15 courses from the curricu-
um?"

Iracane conceded that he went a bit overboard when he told reporters that it was a "little unethical" for the
what he was talking about," Harris said. "I assigned the story. But he didn't say anything."

The Western Kentucky University
president insists that he was not upset
by the way the paper ran the story.

"I thought they might put it on the front page," he said. "They were very fair."

But he is still raging at the first
Courier-Journal story that reported on his proposals, claiming that the article fueled the "massive misinformation" in the media.

Tim Roberts reported in the story that Alexander had decided to change
the structure of the school publications against "the recommendations of a faculty committee." Alexander said he did not disagree with the faculty recommendations.

He also claimed that a faculty committee he appointed to analyze the structure of the student publications
had indicated the faculty adviser was functioning as an editor.

Jo-Ann Huff Albers, acting chair of the faculty committee.

Bob Adams, the faculty adviser,
wasn't an outright rejection," she
said. "His story, however, was a fair
representation of what happened."

The Courier-Journal story, picked
up by the wire services, launched the
troversy.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Board of Regents, accused the journalism department of creating the impression that Alexander wanted to censor the school paper.

"When they tipped off the Courier-
Journal, that implied that censorship
was an issue," Iracane charged in a telephone interview.

"I think that they [the journalism
faculty] were concerned about selfish
motives," he said. "Do you think that the Courier-Journal would have covered that meeting if we were going to delete 15 courses from the curricu-
um?"

Iracane conceded that he went a bit overboard when he told reporters that it was a "little unethical" for the
what he was talking about," Harris
said. "I assigned the story. But he didn't say anything."

The Western Kentucky University
president insists that he was not upset
by the way the paper ran the story.

"I thought they might put it on the front page," he said. "They were very fair."

But he is still raging at the first
Courier-Journal story that reported
on his proposals, claiming that the
article fueled the "massive misinformation" in the media.

Tim Roberts reported in the story
that Alexander had decided to change
the structure of the school publications against "the recommendations
of a faculty committee." Alexander
said he did not disagree with the
faculty recommendations.

He also claimed that a faculty committee he appointed to analyze the structure of the student publications
had indicated the faculty adviser was
functioning as an editor.

Jo-Ann Huff Albers, acting chair of
the faculty committee.

Bob Adams, the faculty adviser,
wasn't an outright rejection," she
said. "His story, however, was a fair
representation of what happened."

The Courier-Journal story, picked
up by the wire services, launched the
troversy.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Board of Regents, accused the journalism department of creating the impression that Alexander wanted to censor the school paper.

"When they tipped off the Courier-
Journal, that implied that censorship
was an issue," Iracane charged in a telephone interview.

"I think that they [the journalism
faculty] were concerned about selfish
motives," he said. "Do you think that the Courier-Journal would have covered that meeting if we were going to delete 15 courses from the curricu-
um?"

Iracane conceded that he went a bit overboard when he told reporters that it was a "little unethical" for the
what he was talking about," Harris
said. "I assigned the story. But he didn't say anything."

The Western Kentucky University
president insists that he was not upset
by the way the paper ran the story.

"I thought they might put it on the front page," he said. "They were very fair."

But he is still raging at the first
Courier-Journal story that reported
on his proposals, claiming that the
article fueled the "massive misinformation" in the media.

Tim Roberts reported in the story
that Alexander had decided to change
the structure of the school publications against "the recommendations
of a faculty committee." Alexander
said he did not disagree with the
faculty recommendations.

He also claimed that a faculty committee he appointed to analyze the structure of the student publications
had indicated the faculty adviser was
functioning as an editor.

Jo-Ann Huff Albers, acting chair of
the faculty committee.

Bob Adams, the faculty adviser,
wasn't an outright rejection," she
said. "His story, however, was a fair
representation of what happened."

The Courier-Journal story, picked
up by the wire services, launched the
troversy.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Board of Regents, accused the journalism department of creating the impression that Alexander wanted to censor the school paper.

"When they tipped off the Courier-
Journal, that implied that censorship
was an issue," Iracane charged in a telephone interview.

"I think that they [the journalism
faculty] were concerned about selfish
motives," he said. "Do you think that the Courier-Journal would have covered that meeting if we were going to delete 15 courses from the curricu-
um?"

Iracane conceded that he went a bit overboard when he told reporters that it was a "little unethical" for the Alexander.

"You have to admire the gall of Kern Alexander," wrote Karl Harrison, executive editor of the Paducah (Ky.) Sun. "He has set out to give the school's political science department an ominous case study in how to conduct business like a Chicago alderman: Don't debate the enemy, destroy him."

"If Alexander emasculates the school's political science department, our student newspapers will start looking somewhere else for good, young journalists, whose clipplings and campus news experience can be trusted."

"The saddest and most infuriating aspect of the WKU saga is that Mr. Alexander is not only a public official, he is also an educator," said the Nashville Tennessean. "As such, he should have more value on the pursuit of the truth and valid educational opportunity than on his personal considerations."

The Courier-Journal said Alexander's proposals appeared to be based on an "inadequate understanding of student publications.... We believe Alexander is a wiser academic leader than that."

"We hope that he'll quickly rethink his plan, or restate it in words that make clear his commitment to a free and vigorous press — and to an outstanding journalism program that has earned full support."

The Herald stated, "The mission of publications is to cover thoroughly Western Kentucky University. Coverage of some of Alexander's actions have brought controversy and embarrassment to the university and may have displeased some alumni. But the solution is to stop the confusion — not the presses."

The shooting seemed to be dying down the day the students had their march against censorship.

That also was the day, however, that Alexander was interviewed by Tim England on public radio station WKYU-FM. In that interview, Alexander said his main concern with the student publication was what he called fiscal accountability.

"Those professors who do not want to submit a budget or a financial plan have created this disturbance," Alexander said in the radio interview. "We have to have policies written down. They objected to that. They objected to having a financial plan."

"Those professors remonstrated and called their friends across the nation and created a freedom of press issue," he insisted.

Robert Adams, the paper's adviser since 1972 and the interim director of student publications, said he was flabbergasted by Alexander's statement. ""He said that budgets weren't sub-

Meanwhile, Alexander said he is going to let a special five-member committee he selected after his plan was attacked suggest ways to reorganize the student publications.

"One of the implications of what he said is that we never had any budgetary controls," he continued. "By saying that we need some kind of fiscal responsibility is an implication that you are having fiscal irresponsibility now."

"I think it raises serious doubts. I think what he has said is defamatory, and it may demand some kind of legal response. What he said has been widely distributed."

"I had no problem submitting a budget. I even think it's a good idea," he added. "Nothing like this has ever happened here before. We take press freedoms for granted. Students have decided the content of this paper for years. It was a freedom I took for granted."

David B. Whittaker, who retired last June 30 as director of student publications, said he plans to meet with Jon Fleischaker, libel lawyer for the Courier-Journal. "He has put me under a false light," the former Courier-Journal copy editor said. "He says that I ran that department from the seat of my pants. That's not true. He said that I never wrote anything down. I wrote a 28-page guideline for all the students."

"He said that budgets weren't sub-

"I told a reporter that it was the most incredible thing that had been said during the most incredible week," he recalled. "University publications have budgets just like every other unit of the university," Adams said. "What he said was ridiculous. No one has ever asked for a budget for the paper at the beginning of the year."

Photo by Roger Vibbert

Bob Bruck, Herald photo editor, and Carla Harris, Herald editor, look over the budget for the March 22 Herald.

"I think it raises serious doubts. I think what he has said is defamatory, and it may demand some kind of legal response. What he said has been widely distributed."

Whittaker said he believes that Adams appears to be the target of Alexander's attempt to control the paper.

"He was the paper's adviser during a lot of those stories and Alexander thinks he had something to do with it," he continued. "Well, Alexander should know that Robert Adams was once picked as the distinguished student publications, said he plans to meet

EDITOR & PUBLISHER for April 2, 1988
The former publications chief also said that Alexander had 14 months to come up with a plan to reorganize the paper.

Joe Iracane said that none of the budgetary controls Alexander wanted to put into effect reflected on the honesty of the two men. "Their integrity is not being challenged," he stated.

Iracane left open the possibility, however, that the dispute might result in some repercussions for the faculty. Asked whether faculty members who had spoken out against Alexander might be in some jeopardy, he said he "can't answer that at this point."

Alexander said he had no intention of retaliating against those who disagreed with him.

"I was a professor," he said. "If a faculty member had done something that suggests reprisals, I wouldn't know what they were."

Patsy Judd, a member of the Board of Regents and a former partner with Adams in four area papers, said that Adams had nothing to worry about.

"He has tenure," she said. "I don't anticipate anything. As far as retaliation is concerned, that just won't happen."

Paul McMasters, deputy editorial director of USA Today and national Freedom of Information chairman for the Society of Professional Journalists, said that a three-person investigating unit had decided that "the basic problems and the resultant uproar can be laid to president Alexander's feet."

We think that the censorship issue is dead," he said. "At least we hope that. We will continue to monitor the situation. We believe that the issue of financial and budgetary reporting is a red herring.

"We looked extensively into the budget and finance reporting of the publications and we find that it complies with all the university policies and goes even further," he said.

"I think that severe damage has been done in the short term to the reputation of the journalism school," he added.

The three-member SPL SDX investigating unit was headed by Robert Thorpe, a retired copy editor for the Louisville Times and a former journalism professor at the University of Kentucky. Other members were: James Tidwell, associate professor of journalism at Eastern Illinois University at Charleston; and Laura Hill, a consultant journalist for the Vanderbilt University publications.

Meanwhile, Alexander said he is going to let a special five-member committee he selected after his plan was attacked suggest ways to reorganize the student publications.

Albers, chair of the journalism department and head of the committee, said she didn't believe the committee's report would differ greatly from the one produced by a previous faculty committee.

That group said the current structure worked very well and suggested that the umbrella group of the two student publications could be fixed with a name change — University Publications to Student Publications — to reflect what the organization was all about.

But Howard Bailey, dean of student life and a member of the Albers committee, complained that the student publications had been too independent of the university structure.

"I believe that we need a larger committee to reflect the university at large," he said. "I believe there should be an advisory committee to the paper that would give it a broader perspective."

The committee could give the paper ideas on stories," Bailey continued.

The dean contended that the journalism faculty had given him the impression that campuswide committees were an anathema to newspapers.

"Well, I did a survey and found out that the whole thing was a smoke-screen," he charged.

The Board of Regents, meanwhile, held a special meeting last weekend to give its unanimous support to the committee and said it did not believe the Albers wanted to censor the school publications.

In the midst of all this, the Herald won 18 separate journalism awards in the Society of Professional Journalists' regional competition.

Arrested

(Continued from page 16)

side of the story was being told, its soldiers should not harass the press and routinely refuse interviews.

Officials in Noriega's regime have frequently accused the press of misinforming and conspiring with the Reagan administration and Panamanian opposition to bring Noriega down.

Camargo agreed and said he would do something about it. He then told us we were not under arrest and that we would not be expelled from the country.

He said he would read the newspapers to see if we told the truth about the incident.

Camargo then apologized for not having a taxi to take us back to the hotel and asked if we would mind riding in a police van.

We agreed quickly and, by 9 p.m., three hours after I was arrested, the eight of us were dropped off in front of the hotel.
WKU Regents endorse Alexander plan

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. (AP) - The Western Kentucky University Board of Regents voted Saturday to support President Kermit Alexander in his efforts to establish written policies for two student publications.

The board unanimously endorsed a resolution that said there is an "obvious need for documentation of policies, procedures and fiscal accountability for the College Heights Herald (newspaper)" and the Talisman (yearbook) "and backed efforts to establish such policies.

The proposals, being studied by a subcommittee of a committee appointed last year to look at the operation of the Herald and the Talisman, have been criticized since being released March 16.

Opponents say the changes would allow Alexander to censor the sometimes controversial Herald.

But Board Chairman Joe Iracane said that is not the intent.

"Let me say that any form of administrative control for the written content of the College Heights Herald is not and has never been the desire of the board or of this administration," Iracane said in a statement released after the two-hour special session.

Alexander said the changes are designed to place a buffer between the student publications and the president's office, which now is responsible for its faculty appointments.

"It protects the student press to have procedures written in (we've) gone completely from a discussion of policy to a discussion of censorship," Alexander said. "It took quite a leap to get there.

Robert Adams, adviser to the Herald, said he was pleased the board chose to continue with the original proposals, which would get some sort of direction from the board to scrap the plan.

"I'm pleased that the president didn't get some sort of direction from the board to scrap the plan," Adams said. "I feel perfectly comfortable with what the committee will do."

Alexander said he would allow a panel of professional journalists to review the committee's report and make recommendations if there was any concern over administrative interference into the student publications.

The committee is expected to report its findings to the president by May 1.
By DAVID C.L. BAUER - Daily News Staff Writer

The Western Kentucky University Board of Regents voted Saturday to support President Kern Alexander in his efforts to establish written policies for two student publications.

The board unanimously approved a resolution endorsing a study of proposed changes to Western's student publications — the College Heights Herald newspaper and the Talisman yearbook.

The resolution said there is "an obvious need for documentation of policies, procedures and fiscal accountability for the College Heights Herald and the Talisman..." and backed efforts to establish such policies.

The proposals, being studied by a subcommittee of a committee appointed last year to look at the operation of the Herald and the Talisman, have been criticized since being released March 6.

Opponents say the changes would allow Alexander to censor the sometimes controversial Herald.

But Board Chairman Joe Iracane said that is not the intent.

"Let me say that any form of administrative control for the written content of the College Heights Herald is not and has never been the desire of the board or of this administration," Iracane said in a statement released after the two-hour special session.

The changes are designed to place a buffer between the student publications and the president's office, which now is responsible for its faculty appointments, Alexander said.

"It protects the student press to have procedures written... (we've) gone completely from a discussion of policy to a discussion of censorship," Alexander said. "It took quite a leap to get there."

Iracane said he called the special meeting of the regents to "set the record straight."

An ad hoc committee that studied the publications recommended the expansion of a committee to oversee selection of faculty editors and key student positions on the publication staffs.

Use of the term "faculty editors" caused an outcry among university and receiving state funds, Iracane said. "This documentation is necessary not only to fulfill our responsibility to the state and to its citizens, but to protect the integrity of the programs which we operate."

Iracane also praised Alexander's patience in dealing with the criticism the proposals have generated.

"You deserve better than what you have received this past week," Iracane told Alexander. "It is unfortunate that your time and efforts, particularly during a period of such critical activity at the state level, have been consumed by issues which I believe are non-issues."

Robert Adams, adviser to the Herald, said he was pleased the board chose to continue with the subcommittee review.

"I'm pleased that the president didn't get some sort of direction from the board to scrap the plan," Adams said. "I feel perfectly comfortable with what the committee will do."

Alexander said he would allow a panel of professional journalists to review the committee's report and make recommendations if there was any concern over administrative interference into the student publications.

The committee is expected to report its findings to the president by May 1.

Following Alexander's discussion of the ad hoc committee's recommendations, and proposals be said be asked the subcommittees to address, the board went into a one-hour closed session to discuss personnel matters.

No action was taken in the closed session.

Herald wins 18 awards

Western Kentucky University's student newspaper, the College Heights Herald, won 18 awards during the regional competition of The Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

The newspaper won the competition's sweepstakes award, which is given based on total overall points received, and claimed six first place awards. The Herald also took first place for its student magazine in the non-daily publication category.

Individual first place winners were Eric Woehler for non-fiction magazine story, Dorren Klausmitter for in-depth reporting, Royce Vibbert for sports feature photography, and Tom Broekma for spot news photography.

Seven Herald staff members received individual second place awards and four received individual third place awards.

The competition included universities from Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois.
Counting their blessings

By Virginia Anderson
Herald-Leader staff writer

Student editors at the Kentucky Kernel yesterday counted articles for today's edition of the daily campus newspaper.

There was the UK basketball game last night, a lecture by noted English professor Guy Davenport and a scheduled student government debate that was later canceled.

But while the editors counted articles, they also counted their blessings. The Kernel, which publishes 17,000 copies Monday through Friday, seldom is harassed by UK administrators and faculty members, editors said. That is in marked contrast to the situation at Western Kentucky University, where President Kern Alexander last week suggested appointing a faculty editor to the College Heights Herald, Western's award-winning student newspaper.

Kernel editors and staffers said yesterday they were worried about Alexander's suggestion, but said they did not think UK's administration would follow suit.

"It's obviously a slap in the face for the First Amendment," executive editor Jay Blanton said. "It shows his definite disregard for college newspapers. I don't think he really understands what college newspapers are all about."

The flap at Western began when Alexander suggested the faculty editor, who said he feared for his employment if the same paper was distributed to campus.

Editorials said Alexander was trying to punish the paper for covering his administration too aggressively.

The Kernel was quick to come to the defense of its counterpart at Western, running an editorial and a cartoon in Wednesday's edition criticizing Alexander's proposal.

In some cases, college administrations have some control over what goes into the student newspapers because the papers are financially dependent on the university.

(Turn to UK, C2)
From Page C1

That is not the case at UK, where the Kernel's advertising revenue accounts for almost all of its $350,000 annual operating budget. The College Heights Herald, a twice-weekly newspaper with a circulation of 10,000, gets most of its income from advertising. I am accountable, however, to the university for how it spends the money. News and editorial decisions are made by students who sometimes consult with faculty advisers.

The Kernel has been independent since 1971 and is run by students.

Still, it occupies several offices in the basement of the Grehan Building on campus and has an adviser and business manager whose salaries are paid at least in part by UK.

Patsy Martin, the business manager, said the UK administration had not interfered with the Kernel during the eight years she had worked there. “We have a very good relationship with these folks,” she said. “They feel our reporting is fair and accurate. We do get calls, of course, but we have not experienced any attempt at censorship.”

Don Hassett, the Kernel’s editor-in-chief since fall semester, said no one in UK’s administration had ever pressured him to change an article. “I’m really surprised,” Hassett said yesterday. “We catch more flak from students than we do administrators.”

Nonetheless, Hassett said he knew there were times when UK did not approve of Kernel articles or editorials. The Kernel has criticized UK for not allowing students over 21 to drink alcohol in dormitories. Last fall, in an effort to help stop the spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome, it wrote several stories about the availability of condoms on the UK campus.

Hassett said no one tried to get him to stop running articles about the condoms, but he knew the administration did not like them.

These stories led to an editorial cartoon criticizing the new vice chancellor for student affairs, James Kuder, who at the time did not come to the phone to answer a reporter’s questions, Hassett said. The cartoon depicted Kuder inside a condom.

Kuder yesterday said he supported the Kernel, even after the condom cartoon.

“I wasn’t excited about, being put inside a condom, but frankly, I found it to be amusing,” he said. “There’s such a thing as freedom of the press, and the university is committed to the free exchange of ideas. How can you have a free exchange of ideas if you don’t have freedom of the press? You might as well shut down shop if you don’t have that.”

Although Kernel staffers said they were not worried that Alexander’s proposals would affect them, editors of the Eastern Progress at Eastern Kentucky University said they would be worried if Alexander got his way. The Eastern Progress, like the College Heights Herald, is not totally independent. Alexander’s proposal could start a trend, they said, that could hamper their ability to cover campus news.

“It scared me when I first saw it,” said Mike Marzec, editor of the Eastern Progress. “But, I believe Western is getting a good deal of support, and I’m not sure he’ll be successful.”
Regents to discuss publications

BY DAVID C. BAUER

The Western Kentucky University Association's executive board, members of the journalism department, and Western's President Dr. Alexander have agreed to form a joint committee of professional journalists to study the proposed changes in the College Heights Herald, the yearbook, and the Journals. The committee will meet on Tuesday, April 22nd, to discuss the proposed changes.

The proposed changes, which were announced last week, are designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

Editor, Daily News:

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

Editor, Daily News:

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

Editor, Daily News:

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

Editor, Daily News:

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.

If this decision totally rests on President Alexander's shoulders, it should not be enough to make such a critical decision for the Herald and the future of Western's journalism department. Todd Horton 162 VanMeter RockChile 62274

Alexander's plan attacks tradition

Editor, Daily News:

The Western Alumni Association's current march to 'better control' of the college's journalism publications, including the executive board of the Kentucky Press Association, the college's journalism program, and the faculty, is being hailed as a victory for the university. The plan, which was announced last week, is designed to make the Herald and the Journals more professional. The changes include new policies for the hiring of editors, new policies for the selection of stories, and new policies for the treatment of advertising.

The joint committee will be comprised of members of the journalism department, members of the executive board, and members of the College Heights Herald.

Control of Herald means censorship

Editor, Daily News:

The move to place administrative control over the College Heights Herald is not new to the news media. The Herald has been a tabulated paper among the Associated Collegiate Press across the United States for the past three years. Without faculty supervision.

The main reason for the success of the Herald's claimed journalism is that the paper is not afraid to go the extra step to be a bit controversial or argumentative. If faculty members 'take over' in the editing process, the result would be crippling to the Herald's accreditation. They would lose the heart out of the Journalist, and cause a lack of an incentive to achieve recognition. This proposal would be a grave error in media and personnel.
WKU students say no to ‘censorship’

By Bill Estep
South-central Kentucky bureau

BOWLING GREEN — Hundreds of students marched on the university administration building, carrying signs and chanting slogans as they demonstrated in the bright sunshine.

1968? No.
The march and rally were yesterday at Western Kentucky University by students demonstrating support for the award-winning campus newspaper and yearbook.

Western President Kern Alexander sparked a fierce controversy a week ago when he asked a committee to provide guidelines for changes at the publications. He asked for faculty editors and a faculty and student committee to oversee budgets and help choose faculty and student editors.

Many students, faculty members and professional journalists thought the changes would result in administration control over the College Heights Herald newspaper and Talisman yearbook.

(Turn to STUDENTS, A12) David Berger, a photojournalism student from Fort Thomas, holds protest sign.
Students at WKU rally to support their publications

From Page One

The publications now have faculty advisers, but students control the content.

A group called Students for a Free Press organized yesterday’s march from the university center to the administration building atop the hill on Western’s campus.

The purpose of the march changed before it started. Alexander “redefined” his stand on Tuesday and made it clear he did not want to censor or control the newspaper or yearbook, said the three organizers of the march.

“We see it more as a victory march,” said Christian Day, 20, a theater major from Brentwood, Tenn., and one of the organizers.

The students went ahead with the march to show that students at Western are not apathetic and to call for better communication between the administration and faculty, students. The march had some elements of 60s demonstrations, but not the defiance.

Much of that concern dissipated Tuesday when Alexander announced a special session of the senate, he said.

“We’re going to follow all the administration’s rules. We don’t want to be rebellious” because that would defeat the purpose of the march, Cambron said.

“We want to be aggressive” in calling out free press.,” Cambron said. “We just have to be creative."

The crowd swelled to between 400 and 600 as students settled in on the lawn of the administration building to cheer short speeches by the three organizers. Cambron pointed out that the newspaper and yearbook and the journalism department are recognized nationally for excellence.

“My message is, ‘If it isn’t broken, don’t fix it,’ “ he said.

Drew Jurek, 19, a business major from Cleveland, said he participated in the march because he thought most Western students opposed administration control over the newspaper.

The Faculty Senate discussed a resolution supporting student control, but with more financial accountability, said its president, history professor Fred Murphy.

He said there was some tension among faculty members that Alexander’s plan would bring administration control.

“Censorship is obnoxious to the press, it’s obnoxious to me and its obnoxious to you,” he said.

Alexander held his public forum after the march to explain his position.

He strongly criticized the campus media for suggesting he wanted to censor the paper and yearbook.

“Censorship is obnoxious to the press, the same as faculty adviser."

Although he scoffed at that, Alexander said his goal was to achieve better fiscal accountability for the publications, define in writing the role of the publications committee and advisers and better attach the publications to the university.

Alexander attributed the uproar to a “misinterpretation” of his goals by a sensitive press.

He said some of the misinterpretation might have been intentional so that the changes would be seen as a free press issue when in fact they were not.

Even Alexander supporters said he caused some misunderstanding by using the term “faculty editor” when talking about the faculty person he wanted to work with the newspaper.

Alexander said the term meant the same as faculty adviser.

Even as the situation seemed to be improving yesterday, Alexander said things that angered journalism students and faculty.

He said some professors fanned the flames of the controversy by calling associates and alumni across the nation. He said those professors did not want to submit to budgetary control.

“There’s the most incredible thing that’s been said in a most incredible week,” said Bob Adams, interim publications director and faculty adviser for the newspaper.

Students for a Free Press, a WKU group, marched in Bowling Green rally yesterday.
Censorship

Western's president wants to control school paper's content

Who does Kern Alexander think he's fooling? As president of Western Kentucky University, Alexander has proposed that the college newspaper and yearbook be more closely controlled by faculty and the administration.

After the school's own publications committee reviewed The Talisman and College Heights Herald last year, they recommended no major changes in the operations of the yearbook and newspaper. Alexander decided to force the committee back into session to come up with his own suggestions. Those include the appointment of faculty editors to the now student-operated publications. Those editors would, in turn, appoint the student staff.

Academic credit would be given for working in the newsroom, rather than the work-study paychecks most of the staff now receives. Alexander referred to the organizations as "laboratories" of the journalism department.

I don't know many chemistry students who have to sell ads to get new laboratory equipment. You see, that's how it works at WKU, as well as many college newspapers, including Murray State's. Where I experienced newspaperwork for the first time. Just like in the "real world", the papers' survival depends on how well the staff writes, photographs, sells, and designs.

Attending college requires a certain amount of autonomy in college publications. Most of the time they progress because of hard work and good ideas, not because the university decides to give them more money.

As an example, the last year I was working at The Murray State News, the staff was able to purchase new typesetting equipment from additional advertising revenue. The university's initial "investment" in the paper hadn't changed.

Alexander also wants to limit the number of people who can be on the college staffs. Only those who will receive academic credit for working can be a part of his "laboratory" experience.

College newspapers survive on people willing to work for experience. Because of the nature of the business, people from departments outside journalism or advertising benefit from the job. Any academic credit they would receive would probably be considered an elective and virtually useless toward getting credits in their major for their degree.

Most of the student journalists spend more time at the paper. Please see CENSORSHIP

Page A5, column 1

Continued from page A4

than in class and to receive one or three hours credit a semester for anywhere from six to 60 hours work is absurdly lopsided. "Bringing" the students with a puny academic credit won't make them any more receptive to the will of the administration. A work-study paycheck, however meager, gives students a taste of the incentive most will drive for the rest of their lives.

But the most reprehensible thing about Alexander's proposal is his effort to control the content and nature of the publications. College Heights Herald is no public relations tool for the university. Although Western's positives are shown as readily as the negatives, like any good newspaper, it analyzes what is going on around campus and the issues important to students and higher education as a whole.

All that includes criticizing Alexander and his administration when the student editors see something they don't agree with. In fact, some of the staff believe it is this criticism that sparked Alexander's plan in the first place.

By appointing faculty, who may have no newspaper experience at all, to "clear" what is being reported and said in these student publications, they will cease to be student-oriented.

Because of college newspapers, students receive practical experience and first-hand knowledge in the field of journalism before they graduate. Staffs do need guidance and advice, they don't need their hands held by people only interested in telling half of the story.
Note to Alexander: If it isn't broken, don't try fixing it

Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander seems to want more control over the campus newspaper, the College Heights Herald.

Of course, he says this has nothing to do with the fact that the Herald (along with many papers in the state) has aggressively reported some of the more controversial actions of his administration.

Of course not.

It is merely an effort to better fit the newspaper into the organizational structure of the university, according to Alexander. If his plan is adopted, this would mean:
- A faculty editor would take the place of the present student editor in directing the overall news operation.
- The faculty editor would be appointed by a new publications committee. The majority of the publications committee would be appointed by Alexander.
- Student participation, even at the staff level, would be curtailed so that no single student could work more than two or three semesters on the paper.

Alexander wants all this to happen by the fall semester.

Even in a vacuum these would be bad ideas, worth discarding because of the implications they have for press freedom and academic freedom at WKU.

In context, they are even worse. The College Heights Herald and the Western Kentucky University journalism programs have national reputations for excellence. The Herald not only provides invaluable training to student journalists, but it also serves its 10,000 campus readers very well. In addition, many newspaper readers in Kentucky (including those of the Messenger-Inquirer) have benefitted from work done by well-trained graduates of the College Heights Herald.

These advantages would be greatly diminished if the paper is reduced to the equivalent of a "chemistry lab," which is the analogy Alexander uses when discussing the changes.

Late last year, a faculty committee studied the university's student publications and recommended no substantial changes in their organization. Plainly, the committee recognized there was no need to fix something that wasn't broken in the first place.

That is a wise strategy. We hope Alexander will reconsider and adopt it as his own.

My advice to Alexander is this: If it isn't broken, don't fix it.

Kevin Eans
5794 Old Kentucky 64, Philpot
Western Kentucky University President Kerri Alexander recently expressed the fact that he wants to see expanded faculty and administrative involvement in the school’s nationally-recognized student newspaper, and yearbook. Because proposed changes would result in the appointment of faculty editors, reports are classifying his actions as an attempt to muzzle the feisty publication. We, too, see the move as an unnecessary one.

Neither Western’s newspaper, the Herald nor the Talisman, the school’s yearbook, currently have such positions. According to Alexander, the implementation of such positions would result in little changes in the way the publications are now being run.

Ironically, last November a faculty committee Alexander instructed to review student publications recommended no substantial changes be made in the operations of either publication. That obviously didn’t suffice. This week Alexander called the committee back wanting to see the following:

- Expanded university publication committees with power to appoint faculty editors, who in turn would appoint the student editors. Student members of the committee would be appointed by the student government.
- Academic credit for working on the newspaper and yearbook and a limited staff consisting only of those receiving credit.

Although the WKU president defends his position as saying the college newspaper is no different from a chemistry lab, some are suggesting the proposed changes are the result of the newspaper’s continued coverage of Alexander in the midst of such controversial issues as plans for a campus in Glasgow, faculty concerns over his appointment of administrators and his recent failure to meet with other university presidents and Gov. Wallace Wilkinson.

The paper, which has a circulation of approximately 10,000 meets most of its expenses from advertising revenues — $121,824 last year. Staff members at the paper are currently paid wages amounting to approximately $45 for a two-week period for a senior reporter instead of receiving college credits.

As we see it, limiting the freedom and creative abilities of the press, or even proposing changes that appear to suggest such offenses, is a serious, and questionable course of action to be taken by any college president.

Alexander may be biting off more than he can chew by announcing the need for better fiscal control and stronger organization of two university publications already the recipient of national recognition. Western’s journalism department, headed by Jo-Ann Flatt Albers, is one of the most envied and highly-respected journalism departments anywhere. Students who leave WKU are all-but-guaranteed immediate consideration for positions in their field.

To tamper with, or attempt to fix, a program that is in no present need of repairs is uncalled for. Alexander, on the court of journalism, is guilty of a “fourth foul” and should be sent to the bench to contemplate his offenses before being allowed to re-enter the game. (And let’s not forget what happens to players after their fifth foul.)

Our stance coincides with that of a profound old adage...“If it ain’t broke, why fix it?”
KENTUCKY

FRANKFORT — State workforce has dropped by 175 to 33,361 since December because of hiring freezes imposed by Gov. Wilkinson. State's financial problems led to freeze.

BOWLING GREEN — 150 students protested Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander's proposal for more administrative control over college publications. Alexander: It won't include editorial control.
Censorship issue cannot be ignored

Rightly or wrongly, Western Kentucky University President Kent Alexander has created a furor with his planned changes in the administrative structure of the student newspaper and yearbook.

Editorial

The controversy can only harm both Western and Alexander and should be resolved as quickly as possible while making sure fears of censorship are allayed.

The uproar began after a review of the publications by an ad hoc committee appointed by Alexander.

Alexander said the committee did not go far enough in addressing administrative organization, academic attachment or financial responsibility of the publications.

He then gave a subcommittee of the ad hoc committee the responsibility for implementing changes he believes are needed.

Critics charge Alexander's plans would result in editorial control of the publications by the administration.

Alexander says, however, that censorship is not intended.

He says it actually would be prevented by making sure the publications director reports to someone, such as the dean of Potter College, who would act as a buffer between the publications director and the president.

Before the current interim publications director, Bob Adams, took over, the publications director had reported to the office of the vice president for academic affairs.

Alexander also is concerned about financial accountability for the almost $200,000 spent each year by the publications.

We can't fault Alexander for those positions, but we also understand the concern of critics toward other aspects of his plan.

What is needed is a thorough evaluation of Alexander's plan free from the emotions generated by cries of censorship. Only in that way can Alexander and his critics be satisfied that all concerns have been properly addressed.

That's why we're glad Alexander said Tuesday that he will have professional journalists review the results when the subcommittee has completed its work.

If these journalists decide that implementing Alexander's proposals would create the potential for censorship, "we hope he and the regents supporting the plan will accept the findings and reconsider their stance."

It is important that such publications remain the voice of the students rather than of the administration, while at the same time assuring more financial responsibility and the best professional training possible.
LEXINGTON HERALD-LEADER
CITY/STATE

WKU students plan protest on publications

Staff, wire reports

BOWLING GREEN — Students at Western Kentucky University plan a demonstration Wednesday to protest a proposal that critics say would place more administrative control over the school's newspaper and yearbook.

The demonstration is being organized by theater and government students. They say they fear that their departments may suffer if university President Kern Alexander is successful in his plan for the College Heights Herald newspaper and the Talisman yearbook.

"If Dr. Alexander can do this to the Herald, he can do this to any department," said Bruce Cambron, a government and history student. "He's going to limit the education of everyone on campus," said Melissa Cornett, a government student. "Everybody will lose out."

The demonstration will begin at 11:30 a.m. CST at the Dero Downing University Center. Students plan to march on the administration building.

Meanwhile, the Western Student Publications Alumni Association said yesterday that Alexander was using a recent U.S. Supreme Court censorship decision as an excuse to stifle the newspaper, which has been aggressive in its reporting about Alexander.

Alexander said last week he wanted changes in the College Heights Herald newspaper and the Talisman yearbook.

If Dr. Alexander can do this to the Herald, he can do this to any department," said Bruce Cambron, a government and history student. "He's going to limit the education of everyone on campus," said Melissa Cornett, a government student. "Everybody will lose out."

The demonstration will begin at 11:30 a.m. CST at the Dero Downing University Center. Students plan to march on the administration building.

Meanwhile, the Western Student Publications Alumni Association said yesterday that Alexander was using a recent U.S. Supreme Court censorship decision as an excuse to stifle the newspaper, which has been aggressive in its reporting about Alexander.

He said he wanted a faculty-student committee created to oversee the publication's budgets and help appoint faculty editors who would supervise the publications and have some control over them.

The publications now have faculty advisers, but students make all the decisions on their content.

(WKU students plan protest on publication control plan

From Page B1

Alexander's plan "would create a situation where the university could illegally try to censor both publications," said Chad Carlton, president of the alumni association.

"We're afraid of that; we're not alleging that," said Carl, who was Herald editor in the spring of 1987.

The alumni association researched Alexander's plan over the weekend and found it contained much of the same language used in a recent case in which the Supreme Court ruled that administrators at a high school could legally censor the student newspaper.

Alexander's proposal has been criticized by local and national chapters of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, as well as by student and faculty groups and newspapers across the country.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Western board of regents, blamed The Courier-Journal for the uproar.

I think it's a little unethical. The Courier-Journal attended an interdepartmental meeting, and that they were invited there by someone, prior to us implementing a structure for the betterment of the university," Iracane told the Daily News in Bowling Green.

The Courier-Journal reported on last Tuesday's meeting of a committee that had been formed last year to study Western's student publications. It was during the meeting that Alexander made his proposals.

David V. Hawpe, editor of The Courier-Journal, said he saw no reason to apologize for the article.

"I think that's one of the more extraordinary comments I've ever heard," Hawpe said. "The story didn't mislead anybody unless those quoted were using words they didn't understand."

Hawpe said he spoke with Alexander after the article appeared last Wednesday and was given no indication it was inaccurate.

(Alexander's plan "would create a situation where the university could illegally try to censor both publications," said Chad Carlton, president of the alumni association.

"We're afraid of that; we're not alleging that," said Carl, who was Herald editor in the spring of 1987.

The alumni association researched Alexander's plan over the weekend and found it contained much of the same language used in a recent case in which the Supreme Court ruled that administrators at a high school could legally censor the student newspaper.

Alexander's proposal has been criticized by local and national chapters of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, as well as by student and faculty groups and newspapers across the country.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Western board of regents, blamed The Courier-Journal for the uproar.

I think it's a little unethical. The Courier-Journal attended an interdepartmental meeting, and that they were invited there by someone, prior to us implementing a structure for the betterment of the university," Iracane told the Daily News in Bowling Green.

The Courier-Journal reported on last Tuesday's meeting of a committee that had been formed last year to study Western's student publications. It was during the meeting that Alexander made his proposals.

David V. Hawpe, editor of The Courier-Journal, said he saw no reason to apologize for the article.

"I think that's one of the more extraordinary comments I've ever heard," Hawpe said. "The story didn't mislead anybody unless those quoted were using words they didn't understand."

Hawpe said he spoke with Alexander after the article appeared last Wednesday and was given no indication it was inaccurate.

From Page B1

Alexander's plan "would create a situation where the university could illegally try to censor both publications," said Chad Carlton, president of the alumni association.

"We're afraid of that; we're not alleging that," said Carl, who was Herald editor in the spring of 1987.

The alumni association researched Alexander's plan over the weekend and found it contained much of the same language used in a recent case in which the Supreme Court ruled that administrators at a high school could legally censor the student newspaper.

Alexander's proposal has been criticized by local and national chapters of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, as well as by student and faculty groups and newspapers across the country.

Joe Iracane, chairman of the Western board of regents, blamed The Courier-Journal for the uproar.

I think it's a little unethical. The Courier-Journal attended an interdepartmental meeting, and that they were invited there by someone, prior to us implementing a structure for the betterment of the university," Iracane told the Daily News in Bowling Green.

The Courier-Journal reported on last Tuesday's meeting of a committee that had been formed last year to study Western's student publications. It was during the meeting that Alexander made his proposals.

David V. Hawpe, editor of The Courier-Journal, said he saw no reason to apologize for the article.

"I think that's one of the more extraordinary comments I've ever heard," Hawpe said. "The story didn't mislead anybody unless those quoted were using words they didn't understand."

Hawpe said he spoke with Alexander after the article appeared last Wednesday and was given no indication it was inaccurate.
Alexander move linked to ruling of high school publications that are learning laboratories, give academic credit and have a faculty editor.

Continued from Page 2

A week ago, Alexander called for faculty editors. College Heights Herald and Tallman yearbook, and for giving academic credit to students who work on them. He also said the publications should have laboratories similar to chemistry labs. He asked a committee to look at ways to implement those plans and report back next week.

"The plan fits neatly into many of the criteria the court said gave administrators at Hazelwood the right to censor," Carlson said.

At the time of the Supreme Court ruling, most legal experts said it would not apply to college publications, said Paul K. McMasters, chairman of the Freedom of Information Committee of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

"But some of us said it was only a matter of time before someone attempted to apply the precepts of Hazelwood at a college level," said McMasters, who is deputy editorial director of USA Today.

Alexander would not answer reporters' questions. A spokesman said he was at home in a meeting yesterday and would hold a news conference within 72 hours.

Later yesterday morning, the university's public-information office released a statement from Alexander, which did not address the controversy but said instead that he had been appointed president of the American Education Finance Association over the weekend in Tampa, Fla. It noted that Alexander had edited the association's latest yearbook.

Carlton called on Alexander to explain himself, and called on alumni, students, faculty members and any other concerned about First Amendment rights to write to Alexander and the board of regents to protest.

In other developments yesterday, the journalism student society announced the appointment of a team to investigate the situation, and students announced plans to march on WKU's administration building.

Robert Thorp, a retired Louisville Times copy editor and former University of Kentucky journalism professor, will head a three-member group, which Thorp hopes will arrive on campus later this week.

Also on the team are Laura Epper Hill, consultant journalist at Vanderbilt University, and James Tidwell, journalism professor at Eastern Illinois University.

The protest, planned by students who are not in the journalism program, will take place tomorrow morning.

Christian Ely, a junior majoring in theater who is one of the students planning the protest, said, "I feel for other programs on campus."
WKU president will fulfill contract, chairman of regents says

By TIM ROBERTS
Staff Writer

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. — Despite several offers of other jobs, Kern Alexander will remain at the helm of Western Kentucky University for the duration of his four-year contract, according to Joe Iracane, the chairman of Western's board of regents.

Alexander could not be reached for comment on the interest shown in him by Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in Blacksburg, Va., where a prestigious position as a professor is reportedly his for the asking.

But Iracane, who met with Alexander yesterday in Owensboro, said Alexander is not necessarily turning the Virginia university down for good, but Iracane said Alexander does plan to finish his contract. It expires Jan. 24, 1990, although there are provisions for extensions.

Alexander was appointed Western's seventh president in December 1985.

Iracane would not take a firm stance on Alexander's future at Western, but said, "I hope he's going to be at Western forever."

Iracane went on to say that Alexander and the regents "will weigh the situation down the road. He'll continue to get offers, but that's not the priority at this time."

Robert Smith, dean of Virginia Tech's College of Education, said last week that no official action had been taken on hiring Alexander, but he said faculty members were "absolutely overwhelmed" by Alexander's academic achievements.

And University of Kentucky President David P. Roselle, who was Virginia Tech's provost until last June, said that last spring he approved the appointment of Alexander to the position.

Iracane said Alexander has received "several" offers but would not elaborate on what they were.

"He did not apply for any of the positions he was nominated," Iracane said.

"The fact that there have been offers of jobs doesn't compromise his leadership position at Western," Iracane said.

Controversies involving the Western president were not a factor in Alexander's thinking, Iracane said.

The most recent controversy focuses on Alexander's plans to install a faculty editor of the student newspaper and yearbook and other faculty and administrative involvement — plans that have resulted in a storm of protest from educators and journalists on campus and off.

Iracane said he supports the president's plans. "He has researched the matter, and it's in the best interest of the university."

The issue will come before the regents at their next meeting, now scheduled for April 28.
Words on paper

INDEPENDENT campus newspapers are an enormous nuisance to college presidents. They're always poking their noses where they're not wanted. It's not surprising that a college president would ask, in exasperation, "Shouldn't we do something about that rag?"

The answer is no. And somebody may need to persuade Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander soon. If the proposal he has launched was a trial balloon, somebody needs to pop it. If, as President Alexander asserts, the favor is over semantics — if he really does not intend to stifle the newspaper within a new supervisory structure — then he needs to get his words straightened out.

The newspaper's independence is an essential component of its success. As first described, the president's plan would diminish that independence, regardless of his intent. It would reduce the quality of campus journalism. And that, in turn, would diminish the quality of journalism education. Which is reason enough to abandon the plan — without even discussing the First Amendment.

Here we have something in Kentucky higher education that works, something that has earned a national reputation for excellence. The WKU journalism program places its graduates on America's best newspapers. The student publications at WKU win major awards year after year. What's broke?

President Alexander's proposal appears to be based on an inadequate understanding of student newspapers. It also rebuffs a faculty recommendation on this matter.

We believe President Alexander is a wiser academic leader than that. We hope he'll quickly rethink his plan, or restate it in words that make clear his commitment to a free and vigorous campus press — and to an outstanding journalism program that has earned full support.

"My view is... that freedom of speech means you shall not do something to people either for the views they have or the views they express or the words they speak or write."

—Justice Hugo Black
From Daily News
and AP reports

Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander has told the chairman of the university's Board of Regents that he will not leave the presidency to accept an offer from a Virginia university.

"We had dinner together Sunday night and (Alexander) told me he had no intention of making a decision at this time related to the job," said Joe Iracane, chairman of the the board. "(Alexander said) he has more important responsibilities on hand."

Alexander was offered a university distinguished professorship at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, according to Robert Smith, dean of Virginia Tech's College of Education. The president was recommended for the position and did not apply, Iracane said.

Distinguished professors at Virginia Tech — of which the school has 15 — carry the rank of full professor with tenure. Alexander's current salary is $83,904. The president will not leave Western before his four-year contract expires Jan. 14, 1990, Iracane said.

Iracane said Alexander has received several offers but would not elaborate on what they were. "He did not apply for any of these positions," Iracane said. "He was nominated."

Alexander, 48, was the prime choice of a faculty panel at Virginia Tech, which conducted a nationwide search for a top educator last year to fill the post, according to a Virginia University spokesman.

Alexander, who has been president of Western since December 1985, is a nationally recognized expert in school finance and has been a consultant in that area to several states.

Smith, dean of Virginia Tech's College of Education, said no official action had been taken on hiring Alexander, but he said faculty members were "absolutely overwhelmed" by Alexander's academic achievements.

Iracane said controversies surrounding the president were not a factor in whether Alexander would accept another job offer.

Last week, Alexander announced plans to install faculty editors to oversee the student newspaper and yearbook — a move that has been widely condemned by journalists and educators.

Continued Back Page
Column 5, This Section
Alexander will remain at Western

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. (AP) — Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander will not leave his post to accept a prestigious offer from Virginia Tech, according to a published report.

"The fact that there have been offers of jobs doesn't compromise his leadership position at Western," Joe Iracane, chairman of Western Kentucky's Board of Regents, said in today's editions of The Courier-Journal.

The Louisville newspaper had reported Sunday that Alexander, who has been Western Kentucky's president since December 1985, was considering leaving to accept a distinguished professorship at Virginia Tech.

But the president will not leave Western Kentucky before his four-year contract expires Jan. 14, 1990, Iracane said Sunday after meeting with Alexander.

The president could not be reached for comment.

Alexanders's decision to stay on at Western Kentucky does not mean he has turned the Blacksburg, Va., school down for good, Iracane said.

"He's not in a position to accept or turn it down," Iracane told the newspaper Sunday. "There are other offers and other things involved. He doesn't want to be forced into making a decision at this time."

Iracane said distinguished professors at Virginia Tech — of which the school has 15 — carry rank of full professor with tenure. Alexander's current salary is $83,904.

"Iracane said Alexander has received several offers but would not elaborate on what they were... "He did not apply for any of these positions," Iracane said.

"He was nominated." Alexander, 48, was the prime choice of a faculty panel at Virginia Tech, which conducted a nationwide search for a top educator last year to fill the post, said University of Kentucky President David P. Roselle, who was the Virginia school's provost until he assumed the UK helm last June.

Alexander is a nationally recognized expert in school finance and has been a consultant in that area to numerous states.

Robert Smith, dean of Virginia Tech's College of Education, said last week that no official action had been taken on hiring Alexander, but he said faculty members were "absolutely overwhelmed" by Alexander's academic achievements.

Iracane said controversies surrounding the president were not a factor in whether or not Alexander would accept another job offer.

Last week, Alexander announced plans to install faculty editors to oversee the student newspaper and yearbook — a move that has been widely condemned by journalists and educators.

Iracane said he supports the president's plans.

"He has researched the matter, and it's in the best interest of the university," the regent said.

Iracane would not take a firm stance on Alexander's future at Western Kentucky, but said, "I hope he's going to be at Western forever."

The issue will come before the board of regents at their next meeting, scheduled for April 28.

Iracane said Alexander and the regents "will weigh the situation down the road. He'll continue to get offers, but that's not the priority at this time."
Alexander will remain at Western, report says

Associated Press

BOWLING GREEN — Western Kentucky University President Kem Alexander will remain at the school through the duration of his contract, which expires in 1990, according to a published report.

Despite interest shown by Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, Alexander will not leave before his contract expires, The Courier-Journal reported today.

Alexander was considering leaving his post to accept a distinguished professorship at the Blacksburg, Va., school. But Alexander's decision to stay at Western does not mean he has turned Virginia Tech down for good, said Joe Iracane, chairman of Western's board of regents, who met with Alexander yesterday in Owensboro.

"He's not in a position to accept or turn it (the Virginia offer) down," Iracane said yesterday. "There are other offers and other things involved. He doesn't want to be forced into making a decision at this time."

Alexander has been president of Western since December 1985. His four-year contract expires Jan. 24, 1990, although there are provisions for extensions.

The president could not be reached for comment.

Distinguished professors at Virginia Tech have no teaching duties but carry the rank of full professor and tenure. The school has 15 such professors.

Western president stands by plan to put faculty on school paper

Associated Press

BOWLING GREEN — Western Kentucky University President Kem Alexander says he won't change his mind about adding faculty editors at the college newspaper and yearbook despite criticism of the plan.

Alexander has said the faculty editors would review stories for the College Heights Herald before their publication.

The national president of the Society of Professional Journalists, the editorial director of USA Today and two former College Heights Herald faculty advisers have denounced Alexander's decision.

No major changes in the way the newspaper is being run were deemed necessary by a faculty committee that Alexander asked to review Herald policies in November. Alexander said Tuesday, however, that changes were needed. He discussed the changes he had in mind and appointed a subcommittee that is to report back to him by March 30.

The subcommittee, coordinated by the head of WKU's journalism department, Jo-Ann Huff Al-ers, met for the first time Friday.

Ms. Albers said Thursday that she did not think Alexander's plans were final and that the subcommittee's findings and the opinions of the full committee probably would not parallel what Alexander had said.

Alexander said Thursday that he would not change his approach.

"Of the biggest concern, the creation of a faculty editor, Alexander said, "There is nothing wrong with faculty review."

He said he merely wanted broader student involvement, clearer financial and administrative responsibilities and some kind of academic status for the newspaper.

Faculty members and students rejected the last point, saying that turning the newspaper into a classroom project would destroy its reputation.

Alexander said his model for the student publications was one developed by the approach of David B. Whitaker, who was the Virginia school's provost until he retired last July.

But Whitaker said Friday, "I never edited the copy, and I didn't make it a point to read copy." Whitaker called Alexander's plans "purely a violation of the First Amendment," which guarantees freedom of speech and of the press.

Kern Alexander

Report says WKU president will be staying

From Page B1

Alexander, 48, was the choice of a faculty panel at Virginia Tech, which conducted a nationwide search for a top educator last year to fill the post, said University of Kentucky President, David P. Roselle, who was the Virginia school's provost until he assumed the UK post last June.

Although he would not discuss why Alexander might want to leave Western Kentucky, Iracane said controversies surrounding the president's tenure were not a factor.

Alexander is a nationally recognized expert in school finance and has been a consultant in that area to numerous states.
Educator tries to squelch press

STUDENT reporters at Western Kentucky University recently learned a crucial lesson of journalism — good work can be rewarded with scorn.

Mr. Kern Alexander, WKU president, announced last week that the university newspaper, The College Heights Herald, would be removed from student control and turned into a laboratory product.

That change could greatly alter the philosophy of the newspaper. Instead of student reporters and editors pursuing real stories of interest on campus, they would merely be going through the motions of journalism to satisfy a faculty editor.

Depending on the professor, that laboratory experience could be educational, but it wouldn’t be what the students at WKU now have — a real newspaper.

President Alexander is also recommending that the newspaper and yearbook staffs be limited to students who are taking journalism classes for credit, and giving the school’s publications committee the authority to name faculty editors. He also named an ad hoc committee, which is being chaired by the head of the journalism department, to review all of those proposals.

It seems that President Alexander’s decision to take the punch out of the student newspaper may not have been capricious.

In recent months, The College Heights Herald has reported on such stories as Mr. Alexander’s proposal to locate a satellite campus in Glasgow, Ky., his failure to attend a meeting that Gov. Wallace Wilkinson held for Kentucky university presidents, the concerns on campus about some appointments he has made, and his recent divorce.

The College Heights Herald reporters and editors proved their good news judgment in selecting these stories, all of which were bound to be of high interest at WKU. The stories were aggressively pursued, and accurately reported.

And, sadly enough, President Alexander’s reaction was a common one. History is replete with people who see something they don’t like in print and react by trying to kill the messenger.

Politicians and public officials have tried — sometimes successfully — to stonewall the media. Those who are grinding bigger axes have even tried to ruin a reporter’s career, take a broadcaster’s license away, or put a newspaper out of business — all because they were reporting the truth.

But the saddest — and most infuriating — aspect of the WKU saga is that Mr. Alexander is not only a public official — he is also an educator. As such, he should have more value on pursuit of the truth and valid educational opportunity than on his own personal considerations.
In our view

Press repression at WKU

We are appalled at the blatant attempt by Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander to control the content of the university’s award-winning student newspaper, the College Heights Herald.

Apparently upset about stories in the student newspaper that he considers unfavorable, Alexander has proposed appointing faculty editors for both the College Heights Herald and the Talisman, the school’s yearbook. The faculty editor apparently would have the ultimate authority in deciding which stories were published in the student newspaper, a power the faculty adviser now does not have.

In calling for a faculty editor, Alexander is ignoring the recommendations of a faculty committee he appointed last year to review student publications. That committee recommended no substantial changes in the operation of newspaper and yearbook.

However, Alexander has called the committee back and directed it to draw up plans for faculty editors, give academic credit to students working on the newspaper, limit the student staff to those receiving credit, and increase the power of the university’s publications committee. What is the use of the president appointing a committee, if Alexander is going to dictate what the committee decides? For the protection of their own credibility, the committee members should refuse to go along with this sham.

The College Heights Herald is not an irresponsible “scandal sheet.” In our view, it is the best college newspaper in Kentucky. Its editors and reporters refuse to be public relations tools for the university. Instead, they provide WKU students with hard-hitting stories that require excellent reporting.

We have the highest esteem for the journalism program at WKU. We base much of that opinion on the quality of WKU students who have come to work for this newspaper. Western consistently produces skilled journalists who have the desire to immediately have a positive impact as professional journalists. We think they picked up a lot of those practical skills by working on the College Heights Herald.

The College Heights Herald is an outstanding learning ground for students because it gives them the freedom to make their own decisions and pursue the stories they think other students want to read. In addition to unwisely stifling freedom of the press, Alexander’s recommendations would damage both an outstanding student newspaper and journalism program.

When someone in power attempts to stifle the press, it is a sure sign of the abuse of that power.
Alexander defends publications proposals

Continued from page 1

Bowling Green, Ky. (AP) — Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander said his proposals for more administrative control over the student newspaper and yearbook have been mislabeled as an attempt at censorship.

"There have been some wild conjectures as far as leaps to conclusion. I have never heard such wild conjecture as I have heard," he said Wednesday.

"If the president wanted to censor the student newspaper there couldn't be a better arrangement. What I proposed is the opposite of that — something that would create a buffer between the (newspaper) and the administration."

Alexander said there is little difference between his proposed faculty editors for the College Heights Herald and the Talisman and the faculty advisers they have now.

He made his proposal Tuesday to a faculty committee that had recommended making no substantial changes in the publications' operations.

He also instructed the committee to expand WKU's publications to a faculty committee that had recommended making no substantial changes in the publications' operations.

He also instructed the committee to expand WKU's publications to a faculty committee that had recommended making no substantial changes in the publications' operations.

He also instructed the committee to expand WKU's publications to a faculty committee that had recommended making no substantial changes in the publications' operations.

Robert Adams, faculty adviser

Continued on page 10.

Alexander defends publications proposals

Continued from page 1

to the Herald, said the title of faculty editor seems to imply the faculty member would have a final say in the newspaper's content — something from which he says he steers clear.

"I think there's a great misconception that I determine the content of the newspaper... that's just not so," Adams said.

"People outside of journalism, particularly if they deal with students, sometimes don't understand the concept. They think we should be able to tell students what not to do — because they can tell people to do that."

The Herald has, at times, drawn criticism from the WKU administration. Last spring, university officials labeled the newspaper insensitive for an article it published about a black, unwed mother who gave birth to her second child the week before the article ran in the Herald's magazine section. The article and pictures stirred protests by black students.

Alexander said his proposals stemmed partly from his desire for stronger organization and better fiscal control of the publications.

The Herald operates on advertising and circulation revenues of about $125,000 a year. The university supplies the building space and utilities, as well as faculty-related costs, Alexander said. Faculty advisers are allowed to reduce their teaching duties by one or two classes a semester, Alexander said, which adds up to one-quarter to one-half of their salaries being used indirectly for the student publications.

"Money control is always a concern of ours," Alexander said. "We have to be fiscally responsible and try to stretch our dollars every way we can."

The Herald is a three-time winner of the national Pacemaker Award, the highest award given by the Associated Collegiate Press. The Talisman has won national honors every year since the mid-1970s.
Proposals for WKU paper cause concern

From Page B1

interest in controlling the content of the newspaper,” said faculty advisor Bob Adams.

Limiting the newspaper’s freedom would hurt efforts to recruit high-quality students to the nationally recognized WKU journalism program, students and faculty fear. “It will cause irreparable damage to what has been recognized as one of the best journalism programs in the nation,” said journalism professor Jim Highland.

The College Heights Herald won the Pacemaker Award, the Associated Collegiate Press’ top award, in 1981, 1982 and 1984.

Graduates of the program work as journalists across the nation. Many called yesterday to ask how they could help.

However, there was some feeling by day’s end that perhaps there wasn’t as much cause for concern as was first thought.

Jo-Ann Huff Albers, head of Western’s journalism department, said after an afternoon meeting with Alexander that she thought Alexander did not want to control the paper.

“I really see the operation continuing as it does,” with the same editorial independence, she said.

Albers was appointed to head a committee to recommend guidelines for carrying out the changes Alexander wants. Its report is due in two weeks.

Alexander said his intent was not to muzzle the newspaper.

He said that under current guidelines, he appointed the director of university publications and the faculty adviser for the newspaper.

He said he had three basic goals: continuity of faculty leadership for the student publications; improved fiscal accountability and reporting to the administration; and better administrative attachment to the university.

“We’re trying to ensure that the student newspaper has some continuity and gets stronger in the future,” he said.

Albers said Alexander seemed to be flexible on several other points, including credit for working on the publications, and had given the committee free reign to recommend how to accomplish his three basic goals.

She said she was optimistic that a compromise could be reached that would satisfy Alexander, the student publications, the department’s alumni and professional news organizations.

The understanding yesterday of what Alexander wanted, and what the role of the faculty advisory committee and the faculty editors would be, differed with Thursday’s understanding by most people in the department.

There were some private suggestions that Alexander backed down from an original hard-line proposal because of the protest.

He said his proposal had not changed, but rather that it had been misunderstood and that people had overreacted because of that.

Some students and faculty members think the newspaper’s sometimes sharp criticism of Alexander’s decisions played a role in the move for a change.

“There’s a relationship between what we’ve done and what happened,” Harris said.

Among other things, the paper has covered the uproar over Western’s plans to develop a four-year campus at Glasgow and wrote an article contradicting Alexander’s version of when he first talked about the plan to the Board of Regents.

Alexander said the newspaper’s articles and editorials had nothing to do with the changes he wants.

“I think generally they do a good job,” he said.
WKU PRESIDENT REQUESTS REVIEW OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS REPORT

Bowling Green, Ky. -- Western Kentucky University President Kern Alexander is asking for a two-step review of recommendations concerning operation of student publications at the school before he takes action.

On Friday, Alexander met with the Ad Hoc Subcommittee on Publications and Nancy Green, a newspaper publisher from Richmond, Ind., to have the committee explain the report it submitted to him on Thursday.

Ms. Green, who was general manager of student publications at the University of Kentucky and the University of Texas, before becoming a Gannett newspaper executive, will review the subcommittee recommendations.

Then she will meet with a committee of professional journalists to seek their review of what she considers an appropriate model for student publications at WKU, including operational and financial aspects. Her model will be based on review of existing publication operations at WKU and models of various types of student publications programs around the country.

Ms. Green has served 14 colleges and universities in several states in a similar capacity.

The subcommittee recommendations include:

* Changing the titles of the Office of University Publications, the Committee on University Publications and the Director of University Publications to replace the word university with student to reflect the fact that the publications are student efforts.

* Expanding the student publications committee to include representatives of faculty, students and professional journalists.

* Establishing policies and procedures related to the advisory committee, leadership of publications and publications operation.

The subcommittee report stressed the tradition of student editorial autonomy and the generous university support of publications in its report.

- 30 -

JA

Journalism