Dear Edward Cave:

Do not think me neglectful not to have written to you before. This seems to be a year of readjustment and I have found it more convenient to hold over my reply to your delightful letter of September 7th. It would please you I am sure if you could know the choking feeling with which I regard the renewals of the priceless friendships of the past. Remembering this you will realize that I could find no time to write a hurried appreciation of your letter.

My face is turned of course to the East and I presume that very soon some manuscripts will be directed my way. The time with the Michigan Sportsman is a marked time period as you have probably realized but, so necessary after a long forced idleness and the maelstrom of the Detroit Banking fiasco. So with the patching up of the last mementoes of the war and the forgotten period between I am out in the open more than anxious to renew the old activities. Should anything transpire with-in your view that would assist me in this I will appreciate it of course.

Yours cordially,
