Joan of Arc Swaps Scissors for a Sword

Kimberly J. Reynolds
Western Kentucky University, kimberly.reynolds@wku.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.wku.edu/ws_contest
Part of the Creative Writing Commons, and the Women's Studies Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.wku.edu/ws_contest/1

This Poem is brought to you for free and open access by TopSCHOLAR®. It has been accepted for inclusion in Annual Writing Contest by an authorized administrator of TopSCHOLAR®. For more information, please contact topscholar@wku.edu.
Joan of Arc Swaps Scissors for a Sword
By Kimberly J. Reynolds

In the blue-black before dawn,
I creep from my patchwork-quilted bed, tiptoe to the mantle for a candle, light the wick that lends its flicker of light, see the needle and thread on the table only yesterday, mending my mother’s skirt that slipped like flax between my fingers. I take up the blade on the sewing table and grasp my hair, still smelling of smoke from sitting fireside last night, and twist the tresses into a single rope of red. I use the blade to slice through the strands of russet, saw and sever the locks that I coil into one cord of curls and tie with a bit of twine, a token for my mother. I remember when I pricked my finger, and the spot of blood smudged the border of a quilt before I noticed and sucked the coppery dot away. I take a strip of fabric and wrap it around and around my chest, press the breasts flat before pulling on a coarse tunic of lamb’s wool. The cock-crow comes as the sun breaches the horizon. A stitch of light slips through a crack in the wall, a sign from the saints making my body blaze, I ride before the troops tomorrow.